An Epic Hero in the Maqāmāt?

Popular and Elite Literature in the 8th/14th Century

♦ ABSTRACT

This article discusses the Maqāma qāhiriyya from the Maqāmāt rayyāniyya of Šaraf al-Dīn Abū ‘Abdallāh al-Ḥusayn b. Sulaymān b. Rayyān (702-770/1302-1369). Ibn Rayyān’s Maqāma qāhiriyya alludes to the popular epic (sīra) of ‘Antar b. Šaddād. Discussing the motifs drawn from popular epic in this maqāma, the article argues that Ibn Rayyān’s maqāma references Sīrat ‘Antar b. Šaddād to foreground differences and similarities between the maqāma and the popular sīra. This, in turn, shows the Qāhiriyya to be a site where the ethics of elite and popular forms contend.

Keywords: maqāma, sīra, popular epic, ‘Antar b. Šaddād, Maqāmāt rayyāniyya, Mamluk literature.

♦ RÉSUMÉ

Cet article traite de la Maqāma qāhiriyya, contenue dans les Maqāmāt rayyāniyya de Šaraf al-Dīn Abū ‘Abdallāh al-Ḥusayn b. Sulaymān b. Rayyān (702-770/1302-1369). La Maqāma qāhiriyya d’Ibn Rayyān fait référence à l’épopée populaire (sīra) de ‘Antar b. Šaddād. En étudiant les motifs tirés de l’épopée Sīrat ‘Antar b. Šaddād, cet article entend élucider les différences et les similarités entre la maqāma et la sīra. Il montre ainsi que la Qāhiriyya est un champ d’affrontement entre l’éthique de l’élite et les formes populaires.

Mots-clés : maqāma, sīra, épopée populaire, ‘Antar b. Šaddād, Maqāmāt rayyāniyya, littérature mamelouke.

Introduction

Few now employ the notion of “decadence” to describe Mamluk and Ottoman-era Arabic literature. Recent efforts instead have focused on the literary environment for which writers wrote. Scholars now point to the existence of popular culture and literature in the pre-modern period.¹ Oral epics, poetry, and shadow plays existed alongside of elite forms. Yet these new categories and contexts pose problems. How did popular and elite literatures interact?

This article discusses the Qāhiriyya from the Maqāmāt rayyāniyya of Šaraf al-Dīn Abū ‘Abdallāh al-Ḥusayn b. Sulaymān b. Rayyān (702-770/1302-1369). Discussing the motifs drawn from popular epic in this maqāma, the article argues that Ibn Rayyān’s Qāhiriyya alludes to the popular sīra. This, in turn, shows the Qāhiriyya to be a site where the ethics of elite and popular forms contend.

The maqāma in a Period of Change: The Maqāmāt rayyāniyya in the 8th/14th Century

The maqāma is one of the longest lasting and widest traveling of premodern Arabic literary forms. After the foundational works of al-Ḥamaḍānī (d. 398/1008) and al-Ḥarīrī (d. 516/1122) later authors throughout the Muslim world adopted and adapted the form. Many writers composed maqāmāt in the 7th-8th/13th-14th centuries.

The 8th/14th century was a period of important changes to the maqāma. Jaakko Hämeen-Anttila states: “After al-Ḥarīrī, (...) maqama started to be seen as a more or less fixed genre, and al-Ḥarīrī’s picaresque/philological maqama became the model for some two centuries until the genre started disintegrating in the 14th century.”² Devin Stewart describes what he terms a “widening” of the maqāma genre during the same period. As Stewart notes, “from the fourteenth century on, the term maqāma comes to denote simply an epistle, written in rhymed prose, which indulges heavily in formal rhetorical flourishes and aspires to elegance.”³

Modern scholars have studied and edited only a fraction of the texts from this period. In the absence of detailed studies it is premature to outline the reasons for these changes and to what extent they are indicative of larger trends. Nonetheless, one can point to various features of the maqāma that were changing. Perhaps the most immediately recognizable is language.

1. See for example, the organization of Allen, Richards, 2006; Bauer, 2007, p. 151; Heath, 1996, p. xx, provides a good summary of the issues facing current research: “The two traditions have been in continuous interaction, both drawing from and playing off one another. One can seriously argue, in fact, that the dynamics, trends, fashions and histories of either are only completely understood if one fails to take into account the contours and internal operations of the other... Focusing on the magnificent achievements of Arabic and Islamic elite literatures while neglecting their constant interaction with their popular literature analogues can only lead one to misconstrue and misrepresent the concerns and accomplishments of elite authors and their works.”

2. Hämeen-Anttila, 2002, p. 126. For a discussion of al-Ḥarīrī’s collection, see Zakharia, 2000.

3. Stewart, 2006, pp. 145-158.

Hämeen-Anttila points to the existence of so-called “vulgar maqāmas” that employ dialect noting the possible influence of these works on the shadow plays of Ibn Dāniyāl.⁴

The maqāmāt of the 8th-9th/14th-15th centuries foreground narrative artistry over philological complexity. I have noted the way in which one Mamluk author, al-Şafadī al-Barīdī (fl. first quarter of the 8th/14th c.) in his Maqāmāt al-faraġ ba’d al-šidda emphasizes narrative features of the maqāma through intertextual references to anecdotes from the genre of “relief after hardship” tales.⁵ The Maqāmāt rayyāniyya represent another example of the important role of narrative artistry in the maqāmāt of the Mamluk and Ottoman periods.⁶ Is this emphasis on dialectal language and narrative artistry a result of new audiences for the maqāma form?

Ibn Rayyān and his Maqāmāt rayyāniyya

Ibn Rayyān (702-770/1302-1369), the author of the Maqāmāt rayyāniyya, served in the Mamluk administration for much of his life. In 745/1344-1345, he became supervisor of the dīwān in Hama, a position which he held until 748/1347-1348. He then went to Cairo. Ibn Rayyān returned to Aleppo in 749/1348-1349 where he again served in the state administration.⁷

Ibn Rayyān corresponded with the famed Ḥalīl b. Aybak al-Şafadī (696-764/1297-1363). Al-Şafadī records several examples of the poetry and letters which they exchanged. Al-Şafadī praises Ibn Rayyān’s talents as a poet. In addition to the standard forms, Ibn Rayyān also composed muwaššaḥs, zaġals, mawāliyyās, bullayqs, and dūbayts.⁸ Al-Şafadī particularly esteemed Ibn Rayyān’s al-bullayq al-hazlī. Ibn Rayyān also wrote a book entitled the Zahr al-rabī‘ on badī‘ which is not extant.⁹

Ibn Rayyān studied the Maqāmāt of al-Ḥarīrī with Šams al-Dīn b. al-Şā’ig (d. 725/1325) who was also the teacher of al-Şafadī.¹⁰ Al-Şafadī states that he once differed with Ibn Rayyān over the grammatical interpretation of one verse in the Maqāmāt of al-Ḥarīrī.¹¹ The exchange clearly demonstrates the intimate knowledge that Ibn Rayyān had of the maqāma genre.

11. See al-Şafadī, al-Wāfi, IV, pp. 220-221; the dispute surrounded the verse:

fa-lam yazal yabtazzuhu dahruhu mā fīhi min baṭšin wa-‘ūdīn ṣalīb

“Time continued to take from him that which he possessed of strength and robust physique” (al-Ḥarīrī, Maqāmāt, 172).

The difference between the two men concerned whether the particle mā beginning the second hemistich was the second direct object of the verb (yabtazzuhū) or whether it was an appositive (badl) of the pronoun attached to the verb. In order to resolve this conundrum Ibn Rayyān wrote to the Šāfi‘ī ṣayḥ Kamāl al-Dīn

The Maqāmāt rayyāniyya

The ten Maqāmāt rayyāniyya are extant in two manuscripts.¹² The maqāmāt have the following titles (folios are listed in the Ms Cairo and Ms Gotha, respectively):

1. al-ʿUmariyya (ff. 2a-4a; ff. 260a-262b).
2. al-Qāhiriyya (ff. 4a-8a; ff. 262b-265b).
3. al-Siḡāriyya (ff. 13a-19a; ff. 265b-269b).
4. al-Wizāriyya (ff. 8a-11a; ff. 269b-272b).
5. al-Ḥamawiyya (ff. 11a-13a; ff. 272b-275b).
6. al-Wāsiṭiyya (ff. 24b-29b; ff. 275b-277a).
7. al-Miṣriyya (ff. 19a-24b; ff. 277a-283b).
8. al-Baṣriyya (ff. 29b-34b; ff. 283b-287b).
9. al-Baḡdādiyya (ff. 34b-41a; ff. 287b-293a).
10. al-Ḥalabiyya (ff. 41a-46a; 293a-297).

In the introduction to the work, Ibn Rayyān describes his mode of composition. He states:

*annī samiʿtu min al-ḥikāyāt šayʿan kaṭīran wa-staḥsantu min mā law ḡamiʿtuhu kāna ḡuzʿan kaṭīran fa-ntaḥabtu minhā ʿašaran wa-ntaqaytu minhā ḡarāʾib law dārat ʿalā al-asmāʿ la-aršafathā ḥamran wa-sabat al-ʿuqūl bi-ḥusn bayānihā wa-inna min al-bayān la-siḥran fa-awdaʿtuhā durrān wa-abdaʿtuhā naẓman wa-naṭran wa-abraztuhā fī šūrat maqāmāt.*¹³

I have heard many stories that I have enjoyed. If I were to collect all of that which delighted me it would have been a lot. Therefore I selected ten from among these and chose rare ones were they to travel to those hearing they would drink of them like wine and captivate their minds on account of their eloquence. For indeed clear expression is a form of licit magic. I deposited pearls in them, and created them with original verse and prose, and made them appear in the form of maqāmas.

Ibn Rayyān thus first heard these tales. He then recorded these tales in rhymed prose, added verses, and placed them in the form of maqāmāt (abraztuhā fī šūrat maqāmāt). Ibn Rayyān's maqāmāt reflect an awareness of central features of the maqāma genre. He uses rhymed prose (saḡʿ) and often alternates between prose and verse (prosimum).¹⁴

Muḥammad b. ʿAlī Ibn ʿAbd al-Wāḥid (d. 727/1326-1327) explaining the difference between them and seeking a resolution. The latter had been a student of Badr al-Dīn Ibn Mālik (d. 686/1287) a noted authority. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid answered these two young men with a fatwā in which he favored the reading of Ibn Rayyān. To al-Šafādī's credit he recorded the entire exchange even though the older grammarian favored the opinion of Ibn Rayyān.

An isnād precedes each of the ten maqāmāt. The Ḥamawiyya begins with the phrase: “I have learned from one of my friends, and those whose transmission I trust among beloved comrades (aḥbaranī ba’d aḥbābī wa-man aṭīqu bi-naqlihi min aḥbābī).”¹⁵ The Miṣriyya opens: “I learned from some of the charming and elegant known for their affection and loyalty (aḥbaranī ba’d al-ẓurafā’ mimman yu’rafu bi-ḥifẓ al-mawadda wa-l-wafā’).”¹⁶ A first-person narrator relates every one of the ten maqāmāt. But there is no consistent hero trickster figure as in al-Ḥarīrī’s Maqāmāt.

Although Ibn Rayyān states that he heard the tales, several derive from written sources. The Wāsiṭiyya borrows its plot from a tale in al-Tanūḥī’s collection, Relief after Hardship.¹⁷ Ibn Rayyān’s Sinḡāriyya references the plot of both al-Ḥarīrī’s Sinḡāriyya and al-Hamaḏānī’s Maḏīriyya. Several maqāmāt refer to events during the Mamluk period: the Ḥamawiyya refers to the Ayyubid rulers of Hama, and in particular to al-Malik al-Muẓaffar, the progenitor of the Ayyubid line in Hama, ‘Umar b. Šāhanšāh Nūr al-Dīn (r. 574-587/1178-1191). The Wizāriyya reflects the cadres of administrative officials to which Ibn Rayyān belonged.¹⁸

Ibn Rayyān’s maqāmāt do not seem to have circulated widely. Al-Itlīdī (d. 12th/18th century) reproduces Ibn Rayyān’s ‘Umaniyya in his I’lām al-nās bi-mā waqa’a li-l-Barāmika ma’a Banī ‘Abbās. Al-Itlīdī mentions Šaraf al-Dīn Ḥusayn b. Rayyān as the tale’s narrator.¹⁹

The Qāhiriyya

The Qāhiriyya is the report of a man who knows the “history of the rulers” (aḥbār al-wulāt). He states that his neighbor was a government official. This neighbor told him a tale of how once he was working in the government administration in Cairo. This official’s tale is as follows:

One day, the Sultan recognizes the official’s excellent performance and appoints him to supervise the affairs of the city of al-Maḥalla.²⁰ The official turns out to be extremely capable. He collects a great deal of money and secures the roads from robbers. For this, the administrator becomes well-known in government circles. The story begins when, one day, the Viceroy (nā’ib al-sulṭān) resident in Alexandria sends a shipment of one hundred thousand dirhams to Cairo. He orders a military officer and group of ten guards to transport

16. Ibn Rayyān, al-Maqāmāt al-rayyāniyya, Ms Cairo f. 19a; Ms Gotha f. 277a.

17. Al-Tanūḥī, al-Faraḡ ba’d al-šidda, IV, pp. 188-189. In the Wāsiṭiyya’s version of the tale, the merchant appoints the agent’s trustworthy son. The son however is kidnapped by the ferocious lion. He is saved from certain death when a group of pigs fortuitously distract the lion. While he is in the lion’s lair, the boy notices the merchant’s money which had been “stolen” by the lion. The final reunion scene with the merchant is a moment of “relief after hardship” (al-faraḡ ba’d al-šidda).

18. The frame tale of the Sinḡāriyya concerns the reason that a man possesses exceptionally long whiskers. The tale explains his exploits in Sinḡār when an encounter with an itinerant beggar leads to his forfeiting his love interest. The tale is similar in construction to the Maḏīriyya of al-Hamaḏānī in which Abū al-Faṭḥ refuses to eat this dish and provides his tale as an explanation. Al-Ḥarīrī’s rewriting of the Maḏīriyya is similarly named Sinḡāriyya which perhaps provided the inspiration for this tale.

the shipment. A guide brings these men to a location on the banks of the Nile in the vicinity of al-Maḥalla. That night, a group of men attacks and robs them of the Viceroy's money. Learning of this incident, the Viceroy sends an official missive (al-marāsim al-šarīfa al-sultāniyya) to the official. The Viceroy's letter orders the official to arrest the perpetrator and restore the stolen money. It threatens further that if he does not find those responsible and the money, the Viceroy will hold him responsible.

Fearing for his own life, the official is worried and cannot sleep. After gaining resolve through prayer, he summons a group of his own men who are "experienced" in affairs, informing them of the situation. He threatens them so that they recover the stolen money. He then informs them about the types of tricks.

One of the senior military commanders, however, feels humiliated by the official's speech. He dresses in poor man's clothing, bringing with him bread and salt and leaves the city. He arrives in a nearby village where he visits the local mosque where he meets a group of travelers and sufis. There, the commander begins to complain of his loss of wealth and family. His companions in the mosque pray, eat, and lie down to sleep. The men then begin to discuss recent news.

One of his companions mentions the theft of the Viceroy's shipment. He states that the perpetrators are a group of ten led by a certain Šaybūb. He describes Šaybūb as being a slave of good character. The man then gives the names of Šaybūb's companions and where they live. The commander rushes back to the official to inform him.

The official then leads a group to find the perpetrators. He arrests ten of them, and retakes their shares of the money. Šaybūb then confronts the official on the battlefield, kills his mount and throws him to the ground. Having the official in a vulnerable position, Šaybūb decides not to kill him. Instead, he escapes. Having lost Šaybūb, the official remains worried for he has not recovered all the money. A short while later, the official learns that Šaybūb's master lives in a nearby village. The master is a man of excellent character, who banished his servant Šaybūb when he committed crimes.

Seeking to get back the remaining money in Šaybūb's possession, the official hatches a plot. He goes to where the master resides and punishes him for the actions of his slave. He strips the man naked, and whips him. His wives were present at his torture and let their hair hang loose (as a form of lamenting), such that Šaybūb learns of it. Being a man of good character, he rushes to the scene and presents himself to the official. The official asks Šaybūb where the money is. He answers in rhymed prose, explaining his actions and shaming the official for unjustly torturing the innocent man.

The official states that Šaybūb astonished him. So he feels pity for Šaybūb, binds him in chains and brings him to Cairo. He presents Šaybūb before the Sultan and tells him the tale. The Sultan is so astonished at Šaybūb's bravery that he allows him to repent on the spot for his crime of brigandage. He then offers him money and a robe of honor. Finally, he makes Šaybūb a military commander (muqaddam) and appoints him to the guards. The Sultan then reappoints the administrator to his position in al-Maḥalla.

References to the Sīra of ‘Antar b. Šaddād

Ibn Rayyān states that his maqāmāt derive from oral tales (ḥikāyāt). The name of the character Šaybūb is well known from the Sīrat ‘Antar b. Šaddād. In the popular epic, Šaybūb is the trickster brother and companion of ‘Antar. Born of a slave girl Zabība, Šaybūb is the son of the “Black King” al-Ġawwār. He appears throughout the ‘Antar cycle as a virtuous, but deceptive warrior. Ibn Rayyān’s portrayal of the figure of Šaybūb does seem to conform with his representation in the sīra of ‘Antar.²¹

Poetry in the maqāma also directly refers to the figure of ‘Antar b. Šaddād, such as “when the voice of the situation” (lisān al-ḥāl) states after the first confrontation between the narrator and Šaybūb:

qad sami‘nā ‘an ibni Šaddādi a‘nī ‘Antarā fi al-ḥurūbi mā qad kafānā
wa-sami‘nā ‘an ḡayrihi min ḡawī al-ba’si umūrun tušayyibu al-wildānā

We have heard all we need of Ibn Šaddād, by which I mean ‘Antar, in battles.

We have heard of other strong men’s feats, which would make youths turn grey-haired.

This reference to the popular epic of ‘Antar predates the first manuscripts of the sīra of ‘Antar which first appear in the 9th/15th century. But as Konrad Hirschler has noted, popular epics such as the sīra of ‘Antar b. Šaddād and al-Baṭṭāl were likely written and performed prior to this. The Qāhiriyya is thus an important witness to the increasing awareness of the Sīrat ‘Antar and other popular epics in elite circles.²²

According to Hirschler, popular epics challenged learned authority over the transmission of knowledge about the past. For this reason, scholars censured trade in these works which they viewed as filled with romance, magic and miracles.²³ Their complaints underscore the fact that many were reading or listening to these works. They portrayed “protagonists who generally emerge out of a marginal position to claim their pre-destined position through a series of adventures that allow them to display their ‘knightly’ traits”.²⁴ As such, the works achieved popularity among both elite and non-elite readers.

Competing Values in the Qāhiriyya

The Qāhiriyya begins from the point of view of the narrator, who is an administrative official. The Sultan appoints the official for his capacity to maintain law and order, prevent theft, and collect taxes. He is an obedient servant of the state, who maintains law and order and for this, the Sultan values his services. His allegiance to the commands of his superiors and promotion of its interests is valuable to the state and Sultan.

Šaybūb, by contrast, is an outlaw. He breaks the law by stealing money sent by the Viceroy of Egypt to the Sultan. Šaybūb's band of outlaws murders innocents and engages in brigandage which is an offense punishable by death. The representatives of the state first want nothing more than to capture and kill the perpetrator of this crime.

The events of the Qāhiriyya resist the simple opposition between the "good" official and the "bad" outlaw. The outlaw's theft of the money and murder of the heroes (abṭāl) guarding the money by another group sets the plot in motion. Yet there is little dwelling on the injustice of the act. Rather, the plot focuses on the response of the official to this theft.

The first part of the story reveals that although the official is free, he is subject to the ruler's threat of violence. For the Viceroy's letter threatens the official with retribution if he does not find the perpetrators. The letter frightens the administrator to such a degree that he begins to worry. Yet the official does not oppose the injustice of these threats. Instead, he inflicts on his subordinates the same violent warnings of retribution. He threatens them so that they arrest the perpetrators and recover the stolen money.

If the first part of the story focuses on official threats of violence, the second section points out their inefficacy in the face of a strong, courageous, and noble opposition. The Viceroy's warnings do not achieve their intended result as they pass down through the hierarchy. For his insulting language causes one of his own military officers to resign his post. And it is the military man's movement outside administrative knowledge that leads to the crucial discovery of the outlaws. Rather than suppress this new information, the former military man immediately informs the administrator. The military man who has deserted his post has shown that courage is sometimes found in resistance.

The official's determination to carry out orders brings him into direct conflict with Šaybūb. But the battlefield reveals Šaybūb to be the courageous warrior. He could have killed the administrator on the battlefield, but did not. The voice of the situation (lisān al-ḥāl) extols Šaybūb in verse as being far braver than the men of the current age.²⁵

The official's actions after his defeat by Šaybūb further underscores the distance between the two men. Rather than granting Šaybūb a victory, the official turns to wanton violence. He seeks to entrap Šaybūb through the unjust torture of Šaybūb's innocent master.

Šaybūb's daring arrival on the scene marks an abrupt shift in the tale. Offering himself in exchange for the innocent free man, he demonstrates his courage. But even more so, he shows the limitations of adherence to the law. For Šaybūb argues that he stole the state's money because he needed to feed his children. Šaybūb's confrontation of the official points to the existence of morality outside of the laws of the state.

25. The final line of this poem is taken from al-Mutanabbī, see al-Mutanabbī, Dīwān al-Mutanabbī, n.d., p. 474. This type of poetic quotation is common in Ibn Rayyān's Maqāmāt.

In a surprising turn of events, the slave Šaybūb persuades the free official. The official in turn then relates his story of courage and bravery which then sways the Sultan. The Sultan's appointment of Šaybūb to his guard acknowledges his courage and value. The administrator returns to his position in the end.

Contending Genres: Elite and Popular Literature

The official and Šaybūb stand for two sets of contending values in the Qāhiriyya. The official's obedience to the state places him in conflict with the brigands. While Šaybūb's loyalty to his kin, comrades, and master puts him into conflict with the ruler. The official represents loyalty to the state, whereas Šaybūb exhibits loyalty to one's family, comrades, and master.

Conflicts between these competing values were inevitable in the Mamluk period. Thus, the maqāma's final scene, in which the official tells the Sultan the tale of Šaybūb's great valor and courage is a moment of transaction and transition. At this point, the Sultan recognizes the real and unappreciated value of Šaybūb. The act of including Šaybūb in his personal guard legitimates his heroic virtue.

The moment of the Sultan's recognition of the hero is not only important for the action of the tale but evokes the basic narrative feature of the maqāma. The uncovering of the hero's identity (anagnorisis) has been suggested by Philip Kennedy as a central feature of the maqāma genre.²⁶ The epic hero Šaybūb, the man of wiles, similarly evokes the trickster hero of the maqāmāt, thus clearly showing the links between these elite and popular traditions.

Moreover, the Sultan's appreciation of Šaybūb points to a positive evaluation of the popular epic as a literary genre. While the character of Šaybūb is from the remote past, his virtues are not. The popular epic of 'Antar celebrates Šaybūb and his heroism. This positive valuation of epic seems to come not only from the Sultan of the story, but also reflects ideas of the Mamluk literary elite.

The central concern of this maqāma is an exchange of money between Alexandria and Cairo. Šaybūb's gang of outlaws interrupts the flow of this transaction. While such outlaws were not uncommon during the Mamluk period, the significance of their actions seems to be greater than a plot complication.²⁷ For throughout the maqāma, Šaybūb's trickster actions evoke the genre of the popular epic. Popular literature thus serves to enrich the maqāma and elite literary fictions. More than a simple monetary exchange, this maqāma seems a subtle act of literary borrowing that enriches the final composition.

Appendix: The Arabic Text of al-Maqāmā al-qāhiriyya

This edition is based on two manuscripts. I have preferred readings of Ms Cairo to Ms Gotha in most cases. I have refrained from altering the prose to conform to Classical Arabic grammar, and intervened only in the poetry.
