

ANNALES ISLAMOLOGIQUES

en ligne en ligne

Anlsl 54 (2021), p. 83-106

Jürgen Paul

Himāya Revisited

Conditions d'utilisation

L'utilisation du contenu de ce site est limitée à un usage personnel et non commercial. Toute autre utilisation du site et de son contenu est soumise à une autorisation préalable de l'éditeur (contact AT ifao.egnet.net). Le copyright est conservé par l'éditeur (Ifao).

Conditions of Use

You may use content in this website only for your personal, noncommercial use. Any further use of this website and its content is forbidden, unless you have obtained prior permission from the publisher (contact AT ifao.egnet.net). The copyright is retained by the publisher (Ifao).

Dernières publications

- | | | |
|---------------|---|--|
| 9782724711233 | Mélanges de l'Institut dominicain d'études orientales 40 | Emmanuel Pisani (éd.) |
| 9782724711424 | Le temple de Dendara XV | Sylvie Cauville, Gaël Pollin, Oussama Bassiouni, Youssreya Hamed |
| 9782724711417 | Le temple de Dendara XIV | Sylvie Cauville, Gaël Pollin, Oussama Bassiouni |
| 9782724711073 | Annales islamologiques 59 | |
| 9782724711097 | La croisade | Abbès Zouache |
| 9782724710977 | ???? ??? ???????? | Guillemette Andreu-Lanoë, Dominique Valbelle |
| 9782724711066 | BIFAO 125 | |
| 9782724711172 | BCAL 39 | |

JÜRGEN PAUL*

Himāya Revisited

♦ ABSTRACT

In 1956, Claude Cahen's study "Notes pour l'histoire de la himāya" was published in the Mélanges Louis Massignon. Cahen assumed that protection (himāya) was first sought and granted for land holdings (against fiscal claims), and that the institution then evolved to a personal relationship which no longer necessarily involved land holdings. This subject, of eminent importance for understanding protection, protectors and protégés in early (and later) Islamic history, has not gained the attention it certainly deserves.

The article takes another look at Cahen's sources; it tries to extend the source basis. The article shows various uses of the term, in particular the ways himāya appointments were used in the Buyid period to integrate leaders on the nomad periphery into government structures. The article also takes the investigation beyond Cahen's time frame, into the 12th century; Cahen thought that the term and the institution did not play a great role in that period any longer, but in eastern Iran especially, it was later used for illegal and undesired practices. In a concluding part, I'll have a look at the use of the term and the institution in the Mongol period.

Keywords: Buyid period, institutions, Iran, Mongol period, protection

* Jürgen Paul, Martin Luther University Halle-Wittenberg, juergen.paul@orientphil.uni-halle.de

♦ RÉSUMÉ

Revisiter la himāya

En 1956, l'étude de Claude Cahen « Notes pour l'histoire de la himāya » a été publiée dans les Mélanges Louis Massignon. Cahen part du principe que la protection (himāya) a d'abord été demandée et accordée pour les propriétés foncières (contre les réclamations fiscales), et que l'institution a ensuite évolué vers une relation personnelle qui n'impliquait plus nécessairement des propriétés foncières. Ce sujet, d'une importance éminente pour la compréhension de la protection, des protecteurs et des protégés au début (et plus tard) de l'histoire islamique, n'a pas reçu l'attention qu'il mérite certainement.

L'article se penche à nouveau sur les sources de Cahen ; il tente d'élargir la base des sources. L'article montre les différentes utilisations du terme, en particulier la façon dont les nominations de himāya ont été utilisées pendant l'époque buyyide pour intégrer les dirigeants de la périphérie nomade dans les structures gouvernementales. L'article porte également l'enquête au-delà de la période de Cahen, au XII^e siècle : Cahen pensait que le terme et l'institution ne jouaient plus un grand rôle à cette époque, mais dans l'est de l'Iran en particulier, il a été utilisé plus tard pour des pratiques illégales et indésirables. Dans une dernière partie, j'examine l'utilisation du terme et de l'institution à l'époque mongole.

Mots-clés : époque buyyide, institutions, Iran, époque mongole, protection

♦ ملخص ♦
مراجعة الحماية

في عام ١٩٥٦، نُشرت دراسة كلود كاهن « مذكريات لتاريخ الحماية » في Mélanges Louis Massignon. وفيها يفترض كاهن أن الحماية كانت في البداية تُطلب من قبل ملكيات الأراضي (في مواجهة المطالبات الضريبية)، وأن هذا النظام المتبعة قد تطور لاحقاً إلى علاقة شخصية لم تعد تعني بالضرورة ملكيات الأراضي. إن هذا الموضوع، ذات الأهمية البالغة لفهم نظام الحماية والحماية والمحميين في التاريخ الإسلامي المبكر (واللاحق)، لم ينل ما يستحقه بلا شك من اهتمام. هذا المقال يعيد بحث مصادر كاهن؛ ويسعى لتوسيع قاعدة المصادر. ويعرض المقال الاستخدامات المختلفة للمصطلح، وعلى نحو خاص كيف كانت تعينيات الحماية تُستخدم في عصر الدولة البوئية لإدماج زعماء المحيط الخارجي للدولة من الرّحّل في هيكلها الحكومية. كذلك فإن المقال يمتد بالاستقصاء إلى مدى أبعد من الإطار الزمني لدراسة كاهن، أي إلى القرن الثاني عشر الميلادي: فقد اعتقد كاهن أن المصطلح والنظام المتبوع لم يعد لهما دور ذو أهمية في تلك الفترة، بيد أنه في شرق إيران على نحو خاص، كان المصطلح مستخدماً في فترة لاحقة لتسمية أشكال من الممارسات غير القانونية وغير المرغوب فيها. وفي جزءٍ ختامي من المقال أقوم بدراسة استخدام المصطلح والنظام المتبوع في العصر المغولي.

الكلمات المفتاحية: العصر البوئي، نظم متبعة، إيران، العصر المغولي، حماية

Introduction

In 1956, Claude Cahen's study “Notes pour l'histoire de la himāya” was published in the Mélanges Louis Massignon.¹ This rather short article should be seen together with its better known pendant, the famous study on the iqtā'.² Both contribute to a central question in the history of the Islamic empire: how did the empire transform itself into a cluster of more or less regional states? And what was the role of landholding patterns, of control over taxation, and the delegation of political power in this process? All of these questions are far from being answered, and it seems to me that Cahen's essays, now over two generations old, still should be taken seriously.

Regarding himāya, one of the words Arabic has for “protection”, it is striking that no publication, to the best of my knowledge, has been devoted to it since Cahen's times, at least not as far as the pre-Mongol period is concerned. Of course, many scholars have contributed to a better understanding of himāya, but they all have written on it only in passing. It is therefore the aim of this contribution to take a fresh look at the question. At first, I'll discuss Cahen's article and add results of recent research. Then, I intend to go beyond his time frame, extending the analysis to the pre-Mongol period in general. This means that I'll add the relevant sources to the picture—those that are useful for the 11th and 12th centuries, in Arabic as well as Persian. For earlier periods, there are some sources which have been published since Cahen wrote, in particular the letters of Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi' which are an essential source for the Buyid period. And since Cahen restricted his analysis mostly to the western regions (especially the Iraqi lowlands and western Iran), I'll also have a look at the eastern provinces of Iran. The contribution will thus take up Cahen's article, and it will give an overview over the different uses of the term until the Mongol period and also provide a short look at the Mongol period itself. Regionally, the focus will be on Iran. A comparison with other regions such as Syria, Yemen, or the Maghreb would be interesting, but is beyond the scope of this paper.

I. Cahen's Article “Notes pour l'histoire de la himāya”

In this section, I take up Cahen's article, adding results from later research. In general, Cahen follows two sets of arguments. Firstly, he discusses the history of himāya as related to older (in part pre-Islamic) institutions, and secondly, he relates himāya to forms of “commendation”, a procedure discussed as one of the roots of “feudalism” in Western Europe: weaker persons “commend” their landholdings to stronger ones. In later sections, I'll address meanings of the Arabic term which Cahen does not discuss in detail. These are not linked to Bedouin traditions of levying “protection money” and not to forms of “commendation”, either.

1. Cahen, 1956.

2. Cahen, 1953. Both articles seem to follow a research program aimed at a larger comparison between “feudalism” in Western Europe and parallel or similar phenomena in the Middle East. I cannot take up this question here again; see Paul, 2016a, pp. 36–54.

One of the very relevant remarks in Cahen's study is that in pre-Islamic times, Bedouins used to take protection money, hifāra, sometimes also called himāya, from caravans passing through their territory. This practice continued into Islamic times when the empire also took hifāra from merchants, so that a competition emerged between "public" and "private" protection payments.³ Cahen does not pursue this point, however—but we shall see that some of the uses of the term are reminiscent of just these payments, and that many later studies of protection relationships rightly point out that Bedouin forms of offering protection were central in the implementation of himāya and other relationships of that kind.

A large part of Cahen's article is devoted to a procedure called ilğā' or talğī'a, derived from Byzantine or Sasanian precedents. In it, a weak person commended his lands to a stronger one in order to get his protection.⁴ Protection was needed against evildoers, but also against fiscal abuses.⁵ Depending on the social status of those in need of protection, their fate differed. Cahen argues that farmers soon came to be sharecroppers (métayers).⁶ Tsugitaka Sato demonstrates how landowners tunnā' (sg. tāni') were forced to hand over their holdings to neighbouring holders of iqtā' and thus had to leave their villages or else to continue as dependent peasants.⁷ The close link between protection himāya and commendation talğī'a is evidenced in Ibn Miskawayh who tells us that Turkish military men "protected the people by means of talğī'a, and the *muqta'*s protected (ḥāmū) the tānis in return for taking protection money from them".⁸ Such relationships are not concluded among equals, and in a way they continue things from the conquest period. For north-western Iran, al-Balādūrī notes: When the Arabs settled in Azerbaijan, everyone took what he was able to take; some Persians sold their land to the Arabs whereas in other cases, the villages were commended to them for protection money, and the villagers became their tenants.⁹

Cahen also addresses the question of how much had to be paid for protection (and there he leaves the talğī'a problem and comes to protection issues in general). This differed widely, and the very sparse information we have seems to indicate that the sums were substantial, a second tithe in the case of Qazwīn and Zanğān¹⁰ and half a tithe in the case of Qum.¹¹ Both regions are located in western Iran and part of the large province of Čibāl.

3. The difference between "public" and "private" used to be one of the major issues in late Roman history and the history of medieval Latin Europe. "Public" refers to activities conducted by the Crown, and the taxes taken in by it, whereas "private" is everything else. This distinction was central also to Cahen who, it should be kept in mind, was a trained historian.

4. Cahen, 1956, p. 288, quoting al-Ḥawārizmī, Mafātiḥ al-‘ulūm, p. 62. Indeed this is all that source has on talğī'a, but the fact that the procedure is mentioned at all in a handbook for clerks means that it was widespread and practiced in the open.

5. Cahen, 1956, p. 288.

6. Cahen, 1956, p. 289.

7. Sato, 1997, p. 34, with reference to Miskawayh, Taġārib al-umam, II, p. 97.

8. Sato, 1997, p. 34, with reference to Miskawayh, Taġārib al-umam, II, p. 175.

9. Cahen, 1956, p. 290; al-Balādūrī, Futūḥ al-buldān, p. 329.

10. Al-Balādūrī, Futūḥ al-buldān, p. 323; Cahen, 1956, p. 291.

11. Cahen, 1956, p. 291; al-Qummi, Tārīḥ-I Qum, pp. 165–166; Drechsler, 1999, pp. 291–292.

Apparently, neither ḥimāya nor talḡī’ā implied any personal dependence; the relationship stayed financial in essence. But the practice seems to have been widespread: in the Umayyad and early Abbasid periods, big ḥimāyāt had come into being, including sometimes entire districts such as Zanğān and Marāğā (in Azerbaijan). It is also noteworthy that these ḥimāyāt were privately owned, for instance they were confiscated from members of the Umayyad dynasty when the Abbasids took over, to end up in private holdings of members of that dynasty.¹²

This system of protection could not last. It came to be a burden for both the government and the people who sought protection. The protectors often did not provide what the agreement was about, but still continued to cash the payments. On the other hand, the government suffered from lower tax receipts. The Buyids therefore tried to rearrange the system by distributing ḥimāyāt alongside iqtā’āt.¹³

This was another step in the emergence of private powers between the state and the broad masses of subjects.¹⁴ The government could do nothing but accept realities, and ḥimāya became an official institution even more than it had been earlier. Protection as an official task was now frequently delegated to private persons. Terms like ḥimāya, ḥifāra and hirāsa (“escort of caravans”) were used alongside each other. In an appointment deed in the letters of the Buyid vizier, Ismā’il b. ‘Abbād called “the Master” (al-ṣāhib), the appointed (unnamed) person is to protect the cultivated lands in a large region in western Iran, the large province of Čibāl (from Rayy to Qazwīn and Qum down to Isfahan) and to take care of security issues of all kind. His endeavours are to be financed by contributions from the regional population, and it is announced that his income is subject to control by the financial authorities. In particular, he is told not to let his troops live off the villages, and not to enlarge their numbers.¹⁵ This letter is discussed in another perspective by Maurice Pomerantz (who does not mention Cahen’s article in his study). Pomerantz writes:

In order to coopt the most powerful Kurdish chieftains, Ibn ‘Abbād offered some Kurdish leaders exclusive rights to protect the trade routes (khifāra) from major cities. Letter 3.5 is a document (sharṭ) ordering a certain chieftain to secure the roads and guard the caravans and travellers between the cities of Rayy, Qazvīn [...], and Isfahān. The document specifies that the addressee is ^{12.} Cahen, 1956, p. 292. Cahen does not discuss the possibility of a particular use of the term in the case of these privatized holdings. They are reminiscent of older practices known under a related but not identical term. Himā could be a kind of private reserve, grazing grounds used as studs, for the private and particular use of members of noble Arab families. Franz, 2005, p. 64, and Chelhod, 1971. The relationship of this old Arabic Bedouin institution to ḥimāya has not been discussed anywhere in the literature as far as I can tell, and this is certainly not the place to do so. But it is striking that usurpation looms large in both ḥimā and ḥimāya.

^{13.} Cahen, 1956, pp. 292–293; Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fi al-tārīħ, VIII, p. 456. In Ibn al-Atīr, this is the report about how Mu’izz al-Dawla (334–356/945–967) introduced the iqtā’āt and distributed ḥimāyāt. Whereas the report about the iqtā’āt is certainly taken from the well-known passage in Miskawayh, Taġārib al-umam, II, pp. 96 seq., the particularities about ḥimāyāt are missing in that source.

^{14.} Cahen 1956, p. 293.

^{15.} Cahen 1956, p. 296; Ibn ‘Abbād, Rasā’il, letter 3.5, p. 61–62.

responsible for protecting the area from acts of corruption and maintaining the obedience of the other members of his tribe. In particular, it specifies that the tribes should charge only a stipulated amount for the protection of caravans.¹⁶

We shall come back to this letter.

Himāya was now an official tax alongside others. It was dealt with in a special office, the dīwān al-himāya; for that, Cahen adduces a number of references.¹⁷ This office, Kurt Franz theorizes, was in charge of keeping an eye on the protection relationships and the related payments.¹⁸ We can add that the existence of himāya dues as official taxes is also attested in documents of tax exemption. In the letters of Ibn ‘Abbād, there is a decree abolishing such dues for *Iṣfahān*¹⁹, and in a decree transmitted in the letters of another Buyid vizier, Abū Iṣhāq Ibrāhīm al-Ṣābi’ (which Cahen does not quote) about the transformation of a former iqtā’ into what amounts to a private holding, the addressee is privileged with a tax exemption which includes himāya dues.²⁰ Another tax exemption in the same collection also lists himāya dues among the taxes which are included in the privilege.²¹ The same document also has an enumeration of various groups of fiscal agents (some of them possibly tax farmers), and among the taxes they are busy collecting, himāya is quoted alongside harağ.²² There is therefore little doubt that in the Buyid states, himāya was a more or less regular tax and was taken in by a separate taxation apparatus, at least in certain regions and at certain times.

Cahen’s article ends with some musings about the fate of talāğī in the new context of widespread iqtā’āt and a section about himāya in an urban context, but both questions cannot be pursued here. As a conclusion, Cahen offers an outlook into the Seljuq period when he says:

16. Pomerantz, 2018, p. 146 for this letter.

17. Cahen, 1956, p. 297. References: al-Rūdrāwarī, Dawl kitāb tağārib al-umam, p. 287 where the author lists dawāwīn al-inšā’ wa-l-barīd wa-l-himāya, “offices of correspondence, postal service/intelligence and himāya”, probably a local one in Wāsiṭ; another one in the same source, p. 252, where a similar list is dressed: al-ḥabar wa-l-barīd wa-l-himāya, “intelligence, postal service and himāya”. The offices could be linked because they all are concerned with the security of communications and routes. Al-Muqaddasī, Aḥsan al-taqāṣīm, p. 64, gives the total amount of the budget, but remarks that this is without al-himāyāt wa-l-ḡibāyāt, “himāya and other dues”. The same situation, namely that monies coming from “protection” were accounted for separately, seems to be the background for a statement about the tax emoluments from Gurgān province: one of the manuscripts adds that besides the amount quoted, there are important incomes from himāya and other dues accruing to the Abbasid government; al-Muqaddasī, Aḥsan al-taqāṣīm, p. 371, note a.

18. Franz, 2007, p. 233.

19. Ibn ‘Abbād, Rasā’il, letter 1.9, p. 31 (Pomerantz, 2018, p. 136), where the author claims at first that the Buyid government did not have anything to do with such dues – only to announce later that they had been abolished, evidently by this government.

20. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, II, p. 48.

21. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, II, p. 398. It is interesting to note that the himāya dues are listed separately from the māṣāliḥ al-sultāniyya, “the Sultan’s dues”. “Sultān” is a term for “legitimate power” in this period.

22. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, II, p. 401.

Fearing indigenous uprisings, the Turkish sovereigns conferred on the army directly the task of keeping order in the cities and everywhere else as far as possible. When their power declined, the development of large feudal commandments united in one hand the various powers which the Buyids still had taken care to distinguish, and therefore there was no need any longer to mention them separately.²³

Therefore, Cahen argues, we do not hear so much of himāya in the later sources. Later sources will be studied below, and we shall see that Cahen's statement has to be qualified.

2. Protection as an Official Task

In the following sections, I discuss meanings and uses of the term himāya which Cahen does not mention or does not dwell on in detail.

First, a basic fact must be stated which Cahen did not develop: Protection, of the trading routes as well as of the population, was the task of the ruler. This included not only fighting robbers and highwaymen, but also keeping order in the relationship between nomad and sedentary. The emergence of private protection relationships, with all they entailed in ways of extra payments, meant that rulers had failed in this elementary task. This was seen quite clearly in notable landowning circles. Thus, we read in the Tārīh-i Qum that the region (that is to say the regional landowners) was subject to half a tithe extra payment.²⁴ The text is not so clear about who is entitled to this payment, but it is explicit in that these people molest the taxpayers and demand more on top of the half tithe for their clerks and retainers (probably including armed followers), but do not provide any protection.

This is unjust, because the reason for taking in the harāğ which has been made mandatory for the people and has been imposed on them, is exactly that it is for protecting the subjects [...] so that their flocks/possessions,²⁵ their children and cultivated lands²⁶ and families/womenfolk²⁷ are safe and protected from all disasters. And a ruler who takes in the harāğ from a district year after year has to be their benefactor and protector and must not tolerate that anybody disturbs them. Therefore, great people/the ancestors²⁸ have said 'No taxation without protection'.²⁹

²³. Cahen, 1956, p. 300.

²⁴. Cahen, 1956, p. 291: People in Qum paid half a tithe extra but otherwise were subject to the harāğ. Drechsler, 1999, pp. 291–292. In the beginning of the relevant passage, we have gurdān wa-himāyat kunandagān as those who originally were the recipients of the tax which later became the half tithe, "intrepid warriors and protectors". I wonder whether we also could read kurdān instead, thus "Kurds and protectors", which would tie in with the situation in general.

²⁵. Amwāl. This term is used for "belongings" in an unspecified way, but also for flocks in particular.

²⁶. Amlāk.

²⁷. Ahālī.

²⁸. Buzurgān.

²⁹. Al-Qummī, Tārīh-i Qum, p. 166. The slogan is al-himāya tūmma al-ğibāya.

The landowners in Qum thought that the government had the duty to protect them, and that this was exactly what they paid the harāğ tax for. But the government evidently was unable to deliver on this point. It is thus interesting to note that, in a text written from the government perspective, the same principle is stated: the harāğ “is God’s wealth and in it are the strength of His bondsmen and the protection of His countries”.³⁰

The idea that taxation was so closely linked to protection (expressed in a rhyming form combining ḡibāya and ḥimāya) was to prevail at least in Hanafi legal thinking.³¹ This was formulated in classical pre-Mongol Hanafi textbooks and survived into the Ottoman Empire.³² Colin Imber writes: “In Hanafi doctrine, taxation is an element in a reciprocally binding contract between the ruler and people: there is no taxation without protection (al-jibaya bi'l-himaya). In allowing the rebels to prevail, the just ruler did not protect his subjects, and so loses the right to taxation”.³³

Rulers and their entourage accepted the duty to protect their subjects as a central task, in particular the protection of the Muslim lands against external enemies. Himāyat al-bayḍa is routinely referred to as such a task in the letters of Abū Iṣhāq Ibrāhīm al-Ṣābi’, sometimes paralleled by the (practically synonymous) ḥiyāṭat al-ḥawza. This is a task in which both the caliph and the Buyid ruler have a share.³⁴ Regional rulers with whom the Buyid ‘Izz al-Dawla Baḥtiyār (356–367/967–978) wanted to establish an alliance were admonished to show loyalty—the addressee is asked to “fight with me for the protection of the Muslim lands”.³⁵ The Buyids are praised for their success in this endeavour³⁶ and loyal servants have their merits in this field.³⁷

Himāyat al-bayḍa can also refer to inner security; in this case in a letter written in rabi‘ I 375/beg. July 22, 985 on behalf of caliph al-Ṭā’i³⁸ to the Buyid ruler Ṣamṣām al-Dawla (r. in Iraq 372–376/983–987, in Fars 380–388/990–998) who had arrested the Dailamī leader

30. In the appointment which al-Ṭā’i³⁹ allegedly wrote for Fahr al-Dawla, preserved in al-Qalqašandī, Şubḥ al-aṣā X (al-Maṭba‘a al-Amīriyya ed.), p. 26, and X (Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiyya ed.), p. 25: [al-harāğ] māl Allāh alladī bibi quwwat ‘ibādihī wa-ḥimāyat bilādihī.

31. The Qumis were never known to be Hanafis. Twelver Shiism was predominant in that region early on, and forms of proto-Shiism before the Twelvers emerged as a separate group.

32. Such as the Transoxanian thinkers al-Kāsānī and Margīnānī. See Heidemann, 2002, p. 326. The classical Hanafite position is formulated e.g. in al-Kāsānī, Badā’i⁴⁰ al-ṣanā’i⁴¹, II, p. 885 (continuous pagination), in the book on zakāt. “One of the conditions of the ruler being permitted to take in the zakāt tax is that the imam [the ruler] indeed provides protection.” Wa-amā šarṭ wilāyat al-ahd fa-anwā’: minhā wuġūd al-ḥimāya min al-imām, and the argument given by Imber follows: if rebels have succeeded in taking taxes from a village or town, the inhabitants there are not subject to another payment to the legitimate ruler because he has failed to protect them.

33. Imber, 1997, p. 71. This problem was already discussed by the notables of Nishapur in 1038 AD when they had to decide whether they should resist the Seljuq invaders. See Paul, 2005.

34. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, I, p. 102, and in more general terms vol. II, p. 140; also alluded to as a shared task in vol. II, p. 184 and p. 430.

35. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, I, p. 51. The addressee is Abū Taġlib (Hamdānid ruler, 356–369/967–979), and the phrase runs al-kawn fī himāyat al-bayḍa ma’ī.

36. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, I, p. 77.

37. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, I, p. 418.

Asfār b. Kurdawayh. The Buyid not only earned benefit from the caliph, but this also was meritorious in ḥimāyat al-bayḍa.³⁸

Government troopers were garrisoned in towns in western Iran in order to provide protection, and they took in extra money called ḥimāya. There is a complaint filed by the people of Rāwand, a small town in the oasis of Kāšān (same region as Qum), who disapproved of a military slave being sent to them and their region. This complaint is rebuffed. Subjects do not have a say in such matters, and the military slave (and his troops) are garrisoned there for the purpose of protection.³⁹

Perhaps such a practice was not a singular case. In an appointment for the Buyid Fahr al-Dawla (r. in Ġibāl 373–387/983–997) written on behalf of the caliph al-Ta’i and transmitted in the letters of Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi’, one item is that the Buyid is to select appropriate people for the ḥimāya of his regions, and in particular those who could draw popular support so that in case of need, well-equipped people would join them.⁴⁰ A very similar text is extant in al-Qalqašandī’s large compendium; it goes back to Abū Ishāq and possibly to the same document. In al-Qalqašandī, again, Fahr al-Dawla is to appoint appropriate persons for the ḥimāya in his regions, men who are quick to respond when called upon. And the ruler is to see to it that the guardians are well equipped (including arms), so that they can guard the “frontier of the roads” taqīr al-masālik. He is also to provide them with all they need, in particular foodstuffs and fodder for their mounts so that they do not have to live off the land.⁴¹

It is therefore possible that in some regions, parts of Ġibāl for example, troopers were garrisoned in certain towns for the purpose of protection and inner security in general, and that these forces were paid with the proceedings of the ḥimāya tax. It is also possible that local people were dissatisfied with their performance and complained that their safety in fact did not improve by their presence. But all the same, this procedure still could be seen as an attempt by the central government to take care of safety issues directly. Such attempts were made in Ġibāl but apparently not in other regions: neither the Iraqi lowlands nor the steppe and desert regions bordering on the irrigated land in Iraq nor the mountainous regions of western Iran, including other tracts of Ġibāl. Whereas in Iraq, Arab Bedouin groups were the issue, the government had to deal with Kurds in western Iran.⁴²

38. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, II, p. 184. Asfār was one of the central military leaders for ‘Aḍud al-Dawla; Busse, 1969, p. 65.

39. Ibn ‘Abbād, Rasā’il, letter 16.6, p. 211; see Pomerantz, 2018, p. 149.

40. Al-Ṣābi’, Dīwān al-rasā’il, II, p. 120.

41. Al-Qalqašandī, Šubḥ al-a’ṣā, X, (al-Maṭba‘a al-Amīriyya ed.), pp. 21, 23–24, and X (Dār al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiyya ed.), pp. 22–23.

42. It is not at all sure whether these groups were “Kurds” in the sense that they spoke a language we would today classify as Kurdish.

3. Protection Delegated to Arab Bedouin Groups and Kurds

In this section, I take up Cahen's argument that himāya can be related to hifāra, and I extend the argument so that, on the side of the Arab Bedouins and Kurds, forms of using himāya as a means to gain control over land are included, and on the side of the (Buyid) rulers, forms of integrating these groups and their leaders into their networks of power are also highlighted. Even more as Cahen thought, himāya can be seen as an instrument in building local and regional power structures.

Taking protection money from caravans is a time-honoured Bedouin practice. This protection money was known as hifāra. Protection relationships extended also to settled lands, oases and towns, in a more general way. Ethnographers have described the uhuwwa ("brotherhood") alliances which frequently degenerated into extortion.⁴³ Cahen evokes this special type of nomad-sedentary relation only briefly, but he discusses a new form of obligations for a lord: "upkeep of public order, defense of villages, of cultivated fields, of transports of foodstuffs against hold-ups by robbers", and the protection of caravans comes naturally with all that. In these new forms of obligations, Cahen sees a mixture of those accruing from talḡī'a and those coming from the older Arab hifāra.⁴⁴

Later authors have insisted on the importance of hifāra and related practices instead of putting forward the talḡī'a when discussing Buyid-period himāya. Busse gives an overview over the cases he could identify in his sources. He remarks that himāya at first was instituted on the same lines as the iqtā'.⁴⁵ He lists the following regions where himāya was allotted to government partners or officials: Tariq Ḫurāṣān (the road leading from Baghdad to the mountains in the east, with Ḥulwān as an important urban centre)⁴⁶, Tariq al-Furāt (the Euphrates road)⁴⁷ and the "West side of Baghdad".⁴⁸

The most prominent cases of large scale himāya in this period concern Bedouin and other Arabs in Iraq on the one hand and Kurdish groups in western Iran on the other. Quite a number of regionally important Arab leaders held himāya positions on behalf of Baghdaidi Buyids.

The "Lord of the Marshes" (the swampy regions along the lower course of the Euphrates and Tigris rivers), 'Imrān b. Šāhīn, held the himāya of that region in the mid-4th/10th century together with other offices.⁴⁹ This man, originally an adventurer, was appointed to the himāya not by the caliph or a Buyid ruler, but by one of the Barīdīs, the famous tax governors there.⁵⁰

43. Lange, 2005, pp. 102–108, with further discussion.

44. Cahen, 1956, p. 294.

45. Busse, 1969, p. 322.

46. The list in Busse, 1969, pp. 322–323. Tariq Ḫurāṣān: Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīḥ, IX, p. 192, s.a. 397.

47. Miskawayh, Taḡārib al-umam, II, p. 48, s.a. 357.

48. Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīḥ, IX, p. 437, s.a. 425.

49. Sato, 1997, p. 39; Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīḥ, VIII, p. 481. This man was an important player in the inner-Buyid struggle during the reign of Izz al-Dawla Bahtiyār.

50. Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīḥ, VIII, p. 481, s.a. 338. Wa-qalladahū himāyat al-Ǧāmida wa-nawāḥī al-baṭā'ib.

More prominently, Abū Ṭarīf ‘Ulyān b. Ṭimāl (the Banū Ṭimāl then were the leading family of the Banū Ḥafāga) was invested with the ḥimāya in and around Kufa.⁵¹ The appointment is extant in the letters of Abū Iṣhāq al-Ṣābi'.⁵² The appointee is told to protect caravans and settled peasants from robbers and to actively pursue evildoers whom he is to punish according to the Quranic prescriptions (this means the death penalty for highway robbery). He also is told to protect draft animals and grazing flocks and to return such beasts as should have been stolen. Concerning protection money, this is not specified in the document, but the incumbent is told not to be heavy on the people. The repartition of the tax emoluments is not mentioned at all. But the appointee is reminded that he answers with his wealth and his body for his deeds.⁵³

Kurt Franz discusses the Banū Ṭimāl and the Ḥafāga in southern Iraq in detail. He comes to the conclusion that through several generations, they did not try to establish any kind of territorial rule in the region, but used their position to continue a largely mobile lifestyle and that their interest in ḥimāya was financial since they derived an important part of their income from that. They were not above turning their ḥimāya into a license to plunder, either.⁵⁴ Occasionally, warriors of the Banū Ḥafāga were also recruited into Buyid forces. The results, however, were not encouraging.⁵⁵

Another prominent case are the Banū ‘Uqayl who, in a number of branches, established dynastic lordships in parts of northern Iraq.⁵⁶ One of their rulers, al-Muqallad b. al-Musayyab (r. in Mosul 386–391/996–1001) was invested first with the ḥimāya “west of the Euphrates” and then also with the ḥimāya of Kufa and its region in 387/997 where he replaced one of the Banū Ṭimāl.⁵⁷ It is interesting to see that the position of ḥimāya was subject to being delegated (over more than one man) just as a governorship was, and that, by the same token, conflicts could arise between the men who held a position in this chain of delegation acts.⁵⁸ Moreover, the holder of ḥimāya was entitled to the “ḥimāya dues” rusūm al-ḥimāya even if the region was

51. Mentioned in Cahen, 1956, p. 299. Cahen qualifies the Banū Ṭimāl as trying to set up local seigneuries, lordships. Mentioned also in Sato, 1997, p. 39.

52. Al-Ṣābi', Dīwān al-rasā'il, II, p. 255. The document is transmitted also in al-Qalqašandi, Şubḥ al-a'sā, X, (al-Maṭba'a al-Amīriyya ed.), pp. 262–263, and X (Dār al-Kutub al-'Ilmiyya ed.), pp. 272–273, taken from al-Ṣābi'. Mentioned in Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīħ, IX, p. 39, s.a. 374/984–985. Ibn al-Atīr adds that this was the “beginning of the emirate of the Banū Ṭimāl”. See also Busse, 1969, p. 323, and Cahen, 1956, p. 299. In the transmitted appointment deed, the writer alludes to a relationship of iṣṭinā', “fostering”, between the Buyid caliph and the appointed Bedouin leader. For this, see Mottahedeh, 2001. The appointed man is thus seen as part of the networks of patronage around the ruler.

53. Al-Qalqašandi, Şubḥ al-a'sā, X, (al-Maṭba'a al-Amīriyya ed.), p. 263, and X (Dār al-Kutub al-'Ilmiyya ed.), pp. 272–273.

54. Franz, 2007, pp. 225–228. Franz is able to trace the Banū Ṭimāl as leading family of the Banū Ḥafāga until the mid-11th century.

55. Franz, 2007, p. 235.

56. Bosworth, 2000.

57. Al-Rūdrāwari, Dayl kitāb taġārib al-umam, pp. 283, 293; Cahen, 1956, p. 297; Sato, 1997, p. 40; Busse, 1969, p. 323; Franz, 2007, p. 228.

58. Al-Rūdrāwari, Dayl kitāb taġārib al-umam, p. 283; Busse, 1969, p. 323.

otherwise in the hands of iqtā'-holders. Together with the himāya of Kufa, al-Muqallad was invested with the title of "leader of the Arabs" za'īm al-‘arab.⁵⁹ In the following years and decades, the two groups—the Banū Timāl of Ḥafāga and representatives of the ‘Uqayl—competed over resources in this area, with the Buyids playing off one group against the other.⁶⁰

Later, in the mid-11th century and thus the final stages of Buyid rule, the himāya over the sawād, the cultivated land in southern Iraq, fell to the Banū Mazyad, the leading family of the Banū Asad.⁶¹ They later established their rule in the region around their centre at Hilla next to Kufa, until the mid-12th century. Himāya in this particular region also continued to be an issue: we read that in 568/1172–1173, a Bedouin group, the Banū Hazn, again from the Ḥafāga, plundered the cultivated lands in southern Iraq, and that they were able to do so because they held the himāya there. And again, there was competition between various Bedouin groups over this possibility to get access to resources.⁶²

What was the nature of these protection relationships? Did the holders of himāya in these regions strive to establish regional states, that is, emirates? Cahen hints at such a possibility by crediting the Banū Timāl with the goal of founding a seigneurie, and using their himāya as one element in this endeavour. Franz, on the contrary, thinks that the Banū Timāl never had such plans, and he criticises Busse for translating himāya once as "governorship".⁶³ But the Banū Timāl are at the one end of a complex range of possibilities, with other groups such as the ‘Uqayl going more into the direction sketched by Cahen and Busse. Franz summarizes his findings as follows:

The emirates offered himāya (tribal protection) to the region as a hybrid new model of provincial statehood. [...] In addition, another form of Bedouin agency must be noted: the Banū Khafāja, on the Arabian bank of the lower Euphrates, exercised the most influence on central Iraq while preferring a mobile raiding economy to state foundation.⁶⁴

The "emirates" in this quote are those founded by the Banū ‘Uqayl and the Banū Mazyad. It is quite telling that Franz speaks of a "hybrid new model of provincial statehood". These "hybrid provincial states" are both nomadic and sedentary; they are not altogether "independent"—they are subject to a larger structure, the Buyid emirate centered at Baghdad, and the caliphate.

Busse in turn comes to the following conclusion: Basically, he says, the situation in Iraq "corresponded to the practice in Fars where districts called Zamm were put under the authority

59. Busse, 1969, p. 323.

60. This is discussed at length in Franz, 2007, pp. 234–239.

61. Sato, 1997, p. 40; Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīħ, IX, pp. 557–558; Bosworth, 1991.

62. Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fī al-tārīħ, XI, p. 182. Himāya and bifāra are used as synonyms in this passage. It must be noted that this was after the fall of the Mazyadid emirate in southern Iraq.

63. Franz, 2007, pp. 238–239; Busse, 1969, p. 87; the German term is "Statthalterschaft".

64. Franz, 2011, p. 31.

of a Kurdish chieftain who was then responsible for the security of the roads and the implementation of measures ordered by the government".⁶⁵

Thus, Busse draws a comparison between Arabs and Kurds: in both cases, the Buyid government decided to integrate leaders on the "nomad periphery" by appointing them to government offices—or to let them have their way, to accept their leadership (and also their extortionist practices) as a fait accompli.

On the "Hūrāsān road", but also in territories within the Zagros mountain range, Kurdish groups were one of the most important political and social factors. Some of the robbers and other evildoers active around Qum who made the landowners there feel an urgent need for protection evidently were Kurds (that is, people whom the sources call akrād).

Cahen quotes an early example which is about talqī'a, not explicitly about himāya. In a long story which al-Balādūrī tells about people in the region of Hamadan, the setting is that there, good pasture is found, and Kurds graze their flocks there, but there also are caliphal herds for which the caliph appointed his men. In a drawn-out conflict between the caliphal supervisors and the Kurds (now called "robbers") which the source reports from different perspectives, the settled landowners suffered most, in particular those living out in the open (ahl al-mafāza). Their solution was to hand over their holdings first to the military commander whom the governor had sent to restore order, but when this man died, his successors were too weak to provide protection, and therefore they asked al-Ma'mūn (caliph 198–218/813–833) to accept their lands as a gift on condition that they were allowed to stay there as his tenants and that he protected them from the bands of robbers. And so it happened.⁶⁶

The letters of Ibn 'Abbād provide numerous examples for deals between Buyid rulers and Kurdish leaders; I have already given one quote above.⁶⁷ The quoted letter transmits the contract between an unnamed man (evidently a Kurdish leader) and the Buyid ruler Mu'ayyid al-Dawla (r. in Ḍibāl—Hamadan and Isfahan—366–373/977–983). Besides the points quoted above, it is noteworthy that the Kurdish leader engages himself to keep out the "evildoing Kurds" who are called "robbers and highwaymen" mutalaṣṣiṣa. "Let barbarians fight barbarians"—as in the Iraqi lowlands, the Buyid government tried to dress groups in the nomadic periphery against each other. This is stated in so many words in a letter (indeed the draft of a contract which would later be concluded orally) from Ibn 'Abbād to one Ṣadaqa b. Aḥmad, a Kurdish leader, and his sons. The addressees had taken their distances from "evildoing Kurds" al-akrād al-mufsidīn and promised loyalty to the Buyid (Mu'ayyid al-Dawla). Pomerantz sums up: the author "then requested that these tribes come to the court with the ruler to exchange loyalty oaths with him face to face. The tribes would then pledge their loyalty to the ruler in exchange for the right to pasturage in particular areas and to collect protection fees from travellers".⁶⁸

65. Busse, 1969, p. 323.

66. Cahen, 1956, pp. 289, 293; al-Balādūrī, Futūḥ al-buldān, pp. 310–311.

67. Cahen, 1956, p. 296; Pomerantz, 2018, p. 146; Ibn 'Abbād, Rasā'il, letter 3.5, p. 61.

68. Pomerantz, 2018, p. 146.

The compensation for loyal service, and in particular for fighting other Kurdish groups, was the right to collect protection fees. Such a contract could also imply the granting of pasture grounds as iqtā' together with financial support, but even that was no guarantee that the Kurds would serve their part of the contract.⁶⁹

In another document, we learn that a man named Abū 'Īsā (also a Kurdish leader) had asked to be appointed to the protection of the caravan routes, but also the guarding of the countryside in a region including Qum. His appointment meant that the government troops would not be diverted from more important tasks. But now, it had become evident that he misused his powers and that his men used their position as a licence to plunder.⁷⁰ Since Ibn 'Abbād had pledged himself for Abū 'Īsā, he asked him now again to protect Qum and Āba and the roads in that region so that he would not be dishonoured.⁷¹

As mentioned above, the "Road of Ḫurāsān" district (Tariq Ḫurāsān) with its important urban centre at Ḥulwān was one of the districts frequently given in himāya. One of the incumbents was Ibn Abī al-Šawk, a Kurdish leader, probably one of the 'Annāzid dynasty.⁷² He was in command of the police forces in Ḥulwān and held the himāya of the town and the tariq. He provoked a punitive expedition by robbing a caravan with envoys returning from the East, he also took the envoys prisoner who had to be ransomed.⁷³

Last but not least, the Kurdish leader Ḥasanwayh, when he was appointed as ra'īs over his group of Kurds (Šūhiġān according to this source, Barzikānī according to others), received a decree written on behalf of the caliph al-Tā'i' dated ša'bān 366 (beg. March 25, 977). In it, Ḥasanwayh is told to "protect the passing travellers and the sedentary population and all those who live in your province and region, protect them so that you earn praise and glory in return".⁷⁴

In the Buyid period, himāya was used as an instrument, alongside iqtā', to implement at least a semblance of rule (and order) on the nomadic periphery of the Buyid states. Arab Bedouin as well as Kurdish leaders were invested to "protect" a given region and the caravan routes passing through. "Protection" implied that the caravans would be safe from uncontrolled plunder, but would be subject to the payment of protection money. This continued earlier practices which were known as bifāra in the case of the Arab Bedouin and perhaps also the Kurds. In the Arab world, such a relation could be extended beyond the "protection" of caravans to the "protection" of settled agricultural districts in ubuwwa-relationships; this was known in practice, if not by this term, also in the Kurdish regions. In all these cases, therefore, the central task of all government, to provide security for the subjects, was not implemented directly by government officials and troops, but indirectly by delegating it to the appointees in the corresponding regions. Arab Bedouin and Kurdish leaders saw an advantage here: they

69. Ibn 'Abbād, Rasā'il, letter 3.7, p. 63; Pomerantz, 2018, p. 146.

70. Ibn 'Abbād, Rasā'il, letter 13.10, pp. 184–186; Pomerantz, 2018, p. 146; Paul, 2018, p. 56.

71. Ibn 'Abbād, Rasā'il, p. 186; Pomerantz, 2018, p. 153.

72. For this dynasty, see Franz, forthcoming.

73. Miskawayh, Taġārib al-umam, II, p. 155; Busse, 1969, p. 322.

74. Al-Šābi', Dīwān al-asā'il, II, p. 176. Cf. Paul, 2018. The passage quoted here came to my attention only after the letters of Abū Ishāq had been published.

drew considerable income from protection money. In case the returns of the arrangement did not satisfy them (or were insufficient to satisfy the needs or demands of their followers), the group could easily revert to plunder.

Appointments to the himaya of districts sometimes was a building-block in state (emirate) building. Out of the Arab Bedouin and Kurdish emirates emerging during the Buyid period, quite a number had seen periods when their leaders had been invested with himāya. In other cases, most notably the Banū Timāl of Hafāga, such state-building does not seem to have been an issue.

In all cases, however, the appointed Arab Bedouin and Kurdish leaders had a share in power; we can speak of shared sovereignty here.⁷⁵

4. Regional Aspects: Himāya in the East

In this section, I go beyond Cahen's regional focus. In discussing material from eastern Iran, I also include later sources (11th and 12th centuries) including texts written in or translated into Persian. These sources also comprise works of inšā', copies or drafts of official or private correspondence. The question of whether the differences found in the meanings and uses of himāya (or himāyat in Persian) are due to an evolution over time or to a difference in language must be left to later research.

Until now, we have dealt with himāya above all in Iraq and western Iran, the Buyid realm(s). Cahen restricted himself to precisely these regions. It is striking that sources from the east do not talk so much about himāya, and when they do, the term does not refer to the particular policies regarding leaders on the nomadic periphery and attempts at maintaining security and order along the routes and throughout the cultivated lands. This is not because there was no need in the east to devise and implement measures to face challenges from the nomadic periphery—but these differed in the Ḡaznavid and Samanid realms from what the Buyids did. Neither do we find any reminiscence of himāya as derived from talḡī'a.⁷⁶ What we do find are attempts at integrating pastoralist groups by granting them grazing grounds and/or appointing their leaders over certain districts in return for military service, but also for the job of keeping all other pastoralists away. The maxim “let barbarians fight barbarians” informed government strategies in the east as well. With regard to the Seljuq Ḡuzz Turks, all states in Transoxiana and Ḥurāsān resorted to this policy.⁷⁷ But as far as I can tell, the term himāyat was not used in this context, and the pastoralists were not supposed to “protect” the regions and pastures they were assigned. Protecting the land was not delegated to allies or vassals in the east in the ways it was in the west.

75. For a discussion of the relationship between central/imperial and local power, see Paul, 2016a, pp. 228–229.

76. There is only one reference to talḡī'a at all in the Persian sources which I have studied so far, in the collection of documents and letters called the Muhtārāt, no. 461, p. 457 where a person swears (in a lawsuit) not to have given over a plot of land, neither in talḡī'a nor in waqf so that a possible sale would be legally valid and not voidable because of that.

77. Paul, 2007–2008; 2016b; Peacock, 2010.

Therefore, it is perhaps not surprising that the only meaning of himāya (or himāyat in Persian) we find in both western and eastern sources is the protection of the realm by the ruler himself. The Samanid governor in Ḫurāsān, Abū al-Ḥasan Sīmğür, is praised for having exerted himself, as a military leader, in himāyat-i bayḍa-yi dawlat.⁷⁸

The “protection” of cultivated lands as a pretext for extortion is mentioned only once, but the agents are not pastoralists, but soldiers. When a Ḡaznavid commander and governor took over in Ḥwārazm, he had a professional army of military slaves with him. He instated clear rules of behaviour so that no one would be tempted to take a plot of land under his protection—the soldiers all received a good salary and did not need anything else. But they thought that the region was for them to plunder.⁷⁹ Even if this is a single occurrence in the sources, the practice may have been widespread. In the west, the people in Rāwand (Kāshān) complained of the garrison which they had received for their protection. In Ḥwārazm, we are looking at a conquering army which had to be restricted in its looting, but interestingly, even there, “protection” was used as a screen for such behaviour.

5. Himāya as Individual Asylum

Much more prominent is a meaning which is not on record for the Buyid period in Iraq and western Iran; however, there is evidence for this use for later periods in these regions as well as in the east: himāya is a term for granting asylum to individuals who flee their enemies, because they have been defeated or because they are persecuted for other reasons. In this meaning, himāya is paralleled with iltiġā' or Persian panāh, “asylum”, “refuge”.⁸⁰ It is however interesting to see that the term himāyat in this meaning is used only in later Persian translations from the Arabic; in the case of al-‘Utbī’s history of Maḥmūd the Ḡaznavid, where we have both the Arabic original (11th century) and the Persian translation (late 12th century), this is particularly striking. A much more detailed analysis of the terminology for “asylum” and “refuge” would be necessary to understand why the translators used himāyat where the Arabic did not have himāya.

In the Umayyad period, the Sāmānhudāt, ancestor of the Samanids, sought refuge with the Arab governor Asad b. ‘Abdallāh al-Qasrī⁸¹ who received him well and granted him asylum himāyat, the two became allies in the course of events.⁸²

78. Al-‘Utbī, Ĝurfādqānī, Tarġuma-yi Tārīb-i yamīnī, p. 41; Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 31. In the Arabic original, we read, in praise of the Sīmğürids: “Everyone of them excelled in protecting the realm like a wall on the frontier” tafarrada kull minhum bi-himāyat al-mulk saddan li-l-ṭugūr. The translator used the Buyid-period standard formula instead.

79. Al-Bayhaqī, Tārīb-i Bayhaqī, p. 679. Kasī-rā zuhra na-bāšad ki ba-dastī zamīn himāyatī gīrad.

80. It is noteworthy that iltiġā' derives from the same Arabic source as talġī'a with the basic meaning of “seeking refuge”.

81. Umayyad governor in Ḫurāsān, 106–109/724–727 and 117–120/735–738.

82. Narṣahī, Tārīb-i Buḥārā, p. 70. Since we do not know on which source Narṣahī relied for this piece, the story can also be taken as indicative of the use of the term in the Samanid period when Narṣahī was writing (10th century).

In another story Faḥr al-Dawla, when losing out against ‘Aḍud al-Dawla, fled to Gurgān and sought refuge with the Ziyārid prince Qābūs b. Wušmgīr (367–402/978–1012); his hosts had to decide whether to extradite their “guest” and argued against it: how could we deliver up somebody who expects us to keep our promises and to safeguard him?⁸³

Qābūs tried to deepen his “friendship” with Maḥmūd the Ḡaznavid (388–421/998–1030) by sending a letter in which he sought support in the bounty of the sultan’s himāyat.⁸⁴ Qābūs again granted asylum to a group of Qaraḥanid horsemen who had made a raid into Ḥurāsān but had been defeated by a Ḡaznavid general.⁸⁵

Granting asylum is sometimes a risky affair—if the person seeking refuge is on the wanted list of a strong ruler. We have some examples, mostly from the west, but later. Independent-minded local or regional leaders, lords of castles or Bedouin emirs, abode by the old values of hospitality rather than obeying the sultan’s orders. One of these was the Mazyadid Şadaqa (b. Maṇṣūr, 479–501/1086–1108), known as malik al-‘arab “Lord of the Bedouin Arabs”, in whose obituary Ibn al-Atīr wrote: “He spread his himāya over all those who fled to him before the sultan, and that is something which rulers do not tolerate even from their sons”.⁸⁶

The other example concerns a Kurdish lord whose family held the castle of Fanak (near present-day Cizre) for some 300 years. The lords of that castle were strong because they kept their promises and oaths, had family or tribal loyalty (‘aṣabiyya) and “took by their hand everyone who sought refuge with them”; they extradited nobody, whoever he might be.⁸⁷

Granting asylum to persons “whoever they may be” means in many cases that these persons absconded from prosecution. Asylum givers in such cases came into open conflict with the central authorities. Whereas in the two quoted cases, the emirs in question may have acted in compliance with non-state value systems, the following section will deal with situations where himāya means that powerful people misused their position to shield evildoers from legal prosecution without reference to any such value system.

6. Illegal Protection

The following examples again come from eastern Iran, most of them refer to the 12th century. This does not mean that the specific forms of protection they describe were unknown in other periods and places.

In the well-known collections of draft and model letters and decrees (inšā’) from the Seljuq and Ḫwārazmian periods, frequently appointees are told not to give in to himāyat,

83. Al-‘Utbī, Ġurfādaqānī, Tarğuma-yi Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 48; Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 236.

84. Al-‘Utbī, Ġurfādaqānī, Tarğuma-yi Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 245; Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 425.

85. Al-‘Utbī, Ġurfādaqānī, Tarğuma-yi Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 283; Ta’rīb-i yamīnī, p. 462.

86. Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fi al-tārīb, X, p. 557 s.a. 501. In 501/1108, Şadaqa had been killed in a battle fought against the Seljuq sultan Barkyāruq.

87. Ibn al-Atīr, al-Kāmil fi al-tārīb, XI, p. 109 s.a. 541. Ya’ḥūdūn bi-yad kull man yaltaqī’uhum. Himāya is not mentioned here as a term, but it is clear that the procedure is the same as in the previous example. Note the use of the hand here.

often paired with ‘ināyat (“favour”). Mayhanī, in his collection of ideal letters, gives good examples for that. The ideal behaviour is that a servant sees himself under the protection of his lord (the legitimate ruler). The hidma relationship here implies that the lord alone will foster the servant.⁸⁸ But the relation can also be perverted and put to bad use. Mayhanī gives an ideal letter in which notables of a town complain of someone who has deviated from the rules of law, joined evildoers (probably robbers), and come into the service (hidmatkārī) of an unnamed man “in order to hide his evil under the himāyat of that man” so that he could grab the Muslims’ belongings with impunity.⁸⁹

The problem that some persons enjoyed sufficiently high protection to be able to face prosecution without risk is alluded to in many appointment deeds for cadis and other officials. Protecting robbers in whatever ways must have been widespread. Badi‘ Atabek-i al-Ğuwaynī’s collection of documents has two instances. In one case, the official representatives of the sultan in the region or province of Gurgān, the śihnagān and muqṭa‘ān, are told to abstain from ta‘azzuz wa-himāyat, but instead to cooperate with the newly appointed overseer of pious endowments.⁹⁰ In the appointment deed for a śihna in Ğuwayn (the home region of the author in north-western Ḫurāsān), the man is told to guard the roads well, and to fight all those who give protection himāyat to robbers.⁹¹ Bağdādī’s collection, from the Ḥwārazmian chancery, has an appointment deed for a cadi of cadis in which the appointee is warned against himāyat and ‘ināyat and told not to listen to any “protector” ḥāmī; this warning is extended also to all the local judges the man might appoint.⁹² The anonymous collection al-Muhtārāt min al-rasā'il, with a majority of items from western Iran (in particular Isfahan) and the 12th century, has an appointment deed for a śihna whose task in particular is to fight robbers. All officials throughout the realm are told to refrain from ta‘azzuz and himāyat.⁹³ In another appointment deed for someone in charge of controlling pious endowments in Isfahan, we read that administrators for the individual estates must be chosen according to the will of the newly appointed man, and in the corresponding dīwān, there is to be no himāyat or intercession.⁹⁴

It is therefore clear that illegal or undesired protection, intercession, patronage and clientelism, if not downright corruption, was sufficiently widespread in Seljuq Iran to warrant particular admonitions in appointment deeds, especially for judges and police officers.

But himāyat could also be a powerful instrument for court careers. This is why Nizām al-Mulk warned against the participation of women in politics. Women should not be allowed

88. Mayhanī, Dastūr-i dabīrī, p. 101. For hidma, see Paul, 2014, 2016a.

89. Mayhanī, Dastūr-I dabīrī, p. 116.

90. Al-Ğuwaynī, ‘Atabat al-kataba, p. 55. In earlier texts, ta‘azzuz “getting stronger” is sometimes identified as a motivation behind entering into a talḡī'a, e.g. al-Balādūrī, Futūh al-buldān, pp. 294, 333, in this last case, Ibn al-Faqīh who gives another version of the same story, has taqabbul “seeking to draw closer”, Ibn al-Faqīh, Kitāb al-buldān, p. 282.

91. Al-Ğuwaynī, ‘Atabat al-kataba, p. 61.

92. Bağdādī, al-Tawassul, pp. 64, 74.

93. Muhtārāt, p. 419, no. 396.

94. Muhtārāt, p. 442, no. 424.

to have a say in government matters or to speak to the ruler about financial or military affairs or about legal cases, they should not be allowed to intervene in such affairs or to protect anyone.⁹⁵

It was an advantage (if not necessary) to have a protector at court to make a brilliant career. When the Ḫwārazmšāh (Tekeš, r. 567–596/1172–1200) had destroyed Miyağıq, his own former viceregent in western Iran, his wrath extended to his vizier in Ḫwārazm because this man had been Miyağıq's protector.⁹⁶

7. Into the Mongol Period

In the pre-Mongol period, ḥimāya (or ḥimāyat) appears in a number of meanings: first, it is related to talḡī'a when a landowner hands over his land to a stronger man, hoping to get protection in return. This meaning is not prominent for the Mongol period itself, but resurfaces later, in the 15th century.⁹⁷ Instead, Mongol princes and princesses "protected" lands so that these were no longer subject to "normal" taxation.

Second, the central government took over the task of protecting its subjects itself and sent armed personnel into the regions. Sometimes, for these troops, extra payments were required. This seems to have been common in western Iran, Ġibāl in particular, in the Buyid period. For the Mongol period, I have not encountered such a system.

Third, the central government delegated this task to nomad leaders, Arab Bedouin or Kurds, whom they thus tried to integrate into the state structures. The groups whom such persons led may have plundered (caravans, but also villages) all the same. This form is best seen as a kind of "benefit" (on the same lines as the iqtā') which a ruler bestowed on local strongmen. In some cases, ḥimaya was used as one component in the building of emirates. This type of ḥimāya is best attested in (southern) Iraq where it lasted into the 12th century, and in the mountainous regions of western Iran. It is not recorded, as far as I can tell, in eastern Iran.

Fourth, starting in the Seljuq period, we encounter ḥimāya as a term for "protecting" people against prosecution in court. This use of the term becomes widespread in the Mongol period.⁹⁸ Related to this is the granting of asylum to unsuccessful pretenders or to losers in dynastic struggles.

A fifth facet (which has not been dealt with so far) concerns succession struggles: a faction at court and/or in the military "protects" a given pretender so that at the end, he is enthroned. In this way, the Niẓāmiyya slave soldiers "protected" Barkyāruq in the succession struggle after Maliksāh's death in 1092.⁹⁹ Likewise, in Mongol Kirmān, a powerful Mongol emir started

95. Niẓām al-Mulk, Siyāsat-nāma, p. 190–191, translated by Darke, 1960, p. 191.

96. Al-Rāwandī, Rāḥat al-ṣudūr, p. 399. Ki Miyāğıq ḥimāyatī-yi ū būda būd. For a similar use of the term, see al-Rāwandī, Rāḥat al-ṣudūr, p. 366.

97. I have treated ḥimāya in 15th-century Central Asian sources extensively in Paul, 1991b, and together with a shorter overview over earlier periods, in Paul, 1991a, pp. 164–205.

98. Besides the sources quoted in Paul, 1991a, p. 197. Herrmann, 2004, document V and comments p. 77.

99. Niṣāpūrī, Salğūq-nāma, p. 36.

“protecting” a scion of the pre-Mongol (Hitay) regional dynasty so that he entered into the succession struggle.¹⁰⁰ This use is related to the protection someone needs in order to make a career at court.

The sixth meaning of himāyat (likewise not dealt with before in this paper) is giving shelter to runaway peasants. This meaning is not on record for the pre-Mongol period, probably for a very simple reason. In the Mongol period, labour came to be the scarcest resource in agriculture (not land and not even water), and attempts at restricting peasants in their movements became stronger. Moreover, according to Mongol political thought, the ruler had the right to assign everybody, military or not, his unit (of ten, hundred and thousand) and thus his place of residence. This was one of the main uses of himāyat in the Mongol and post-Mongol periods. I have seen only one allusion to this in the pre-Mongol sources, but that passage seems to concern nomads. In the regional history of Ṭabaristān, one of the rulers is praised for his justice, in particular concerning one of his private domains. This was so well administered that “all the pastoralists from Āmul [...] fled from the custody of the sultan and sought his protection”.¹⁰¹

Conclusion

Himāya or himāyat has a wide range of meanings in the field of “protection”, from a basic obligation of the ruler to illegal procedures linked to relations of clientelism and patronage. Cahen concentrated on the meaning related to commendatio and talqī'a, but perhaps this is a somewhat biased view. In a Buyid context, himāya was rather linked to iqtā' because both were instruments to integrate powerful people, military slaves, tribal leaders of Bedouin Arabs, but also Kurds, into the power networks centered on the Buyid ruler, mostly in Baghdad. The region where himāya relations of this kind are best attested is southern Iraq and Iraq in general on the one hand and the mountainous regions of western Iran, the vast province of Čibāl, on the other. In southern Iraq, the use of the term is attested from the 10th to the late 12th century. Himāya in this context continues Arab bifāra and also uhuwwa relations, and as far as Kurds are concerned, the relations worked very much in the same way. Cahen himself admits that this form of himāya is not connected to talqī'a.

Integrating local power holders, in particular nomads, was one of the major tasks and at the same time one of the most difficult challenges rulers in the Middle East had to face in many ages. It would be fascinating to study such forms and procedures in a comparative perspective over centuries and many different areas. Hopefully, this contribution can serve as one case study in such an endeavour.

In the Buyid context, for both Arab Bedouin and Kurdish leaders, grants of himāya were an element in their state-building processes; but there are exceptions: not all Bedouin leaders who held ḥimāya grants were interested in building emirates. But even so, the delegation of a basic obligation of the ruler to vassals and allies meant that these allies held a share in sovereignty.

100. Al-Kirmānī, Siṁṭ al-‘ulā, p. 28.

101. Ibn Isfandiyār, Tārīħ-i Ṭabaristān, p. 67. Māldārān-i Āmul [...] az ra‘īyatī-yi sultān bu-gurībta ba-himāyat-i ū šudand.

In eastern Iran, however, the basic obligation of rulers to provide security does not seem to have been delegated to vassals as it was in the Buyid realm. Pastoralists were offered grazing grounds in exchange for military service—the Ḡaznavids, the Qarahānids, the last Samanids, and regional rulers in Hwārazm all had recourse to such deals with the Ḡuzz Turks. The contracts often included the obligation on the part of the pastoralists to fight all other such pastoralists, but not the general task of “protecting” a given district.

In the east, ḥimāya mostly meant “granting refuge or asylum to losing pretenders or otherwise prosecuted persons”, and this meaning later is to be found also in the west. In such contexts, it is coterminous with iltiğā' (or Persian panāh), with strong connotation to non-state values. As an extension of this meaning, we can see that the term was used also for “protecting evildoers” or “promoting careers”, both strongly disapproved of. This meaning is also present in Mongol-period sources (including documents) when the practice of “protecting” a party in a lawsuit appears to have been widespread. In the Mongol period, a completely new meaning of the term emerges, linked to the Mongol concept of the right and obligation of the ruler to fix everybody’s place of residence within the framework of the Mongol decimal system: giving shelter to runaway peasants.

“Protection” was a task both for rulers (and therefore a “public” task if such a qualification makes sense at all in an Iraqi and Iranian context) and for patrons (and thus a “private” affair). It was “privatised” in the Buyid realms: delegating it to men who were not simply government officials but leaders in their own right was tantamount to blur the distinctions.

Bibliography

Working Tools

EI² = Encyclopédie de l’islam, 2nd ed., 12 vols, Brill, Leiden, 1960–2007.

EI³ = The Encyclopaedia of Islam, 3rd ed., Brill, Leiden, online since 2007.

Primary Sources

Bağdādī, Bahā’ al-Dīn Muḥammad, al-Tawassul ilā al-tarassul, A. Bahmanyār (ed.), Širkat-i sihāmī-yi čāp, Tehran, 1315.
 al-Balādūrī, Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā, Futūḥ al-buldān, M. J. de Goeje (ed.), Brill, Leiden, 1866.
 al-Bayhaqī, Abū al-Faḍl, Tārīḥ-i Bayhaqī, Ğānī Fayyād (ed.), Čāphānā-yi bānk-i millī-yi Īrān, Tehran, 1324.

al-Ğuwāynī, Bādī’ Atabek, ‘Atabat al-kataba, Muḥammad Qazwīnī (ed.), Širkat-i sihāmī-yi čāp, Tehran, 1329.
 al-Hawārizmī, Abū ‘Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, Mafātiḥ al-‘ulūm, Gerlof van Vloten (ed.), Brill, Leiden, 1895.
 Ibn ‘Abbād, Rasā’il, ‘Abd al-Wahhāb ‘Azzām (ed.), Dār al-Fikr al-‘Arabī, Cairo, 1947.

- Ibn al-Aṭīr, al-Kāmil fi al-tārīḥ, II vols., Abū al-Fidā' 'Abd Allāh al-Qādī (ed.), Dār al-Kutub al-'Ilmiyya, Beyrouth, 1982.
- Ibn al-Faqīh, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad, Kitāb al-buldān, M. J. de Goeje (ed.), Brill, Leiden, 1885.
- Ibn Isfandiyār, Tārīḥ-i Ṭabaristān, 'Abbās Iqbāl (ed.), Asātīr, Tehran, 1389.
- al-Kāṣānī, Maṣ'ūd b. Aḥmad, Badā'i' al-ṣanā'i' fī tarīb al-ṣarā'i', Zakaryā 'Alī Yūsuf (ed.), Matba'at al-Imām, Cairo, n.d. (ca. 1969).
- al-Kirmānī, Nāṣir al-Dīn Muṇšī, Sim̄ al-ṣulā li-l-ḥadra al-'ulyā, 'Abbās Iqbāl (ed.), Širkat-i sihāmī-yi čāp, Tehran, 1328.
- Mayhanī, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Ḥāliq, Dastūr-i dabīrī, Adnan Erzi (ed.), Türk Tarih Kurumu Basımevi, Ankara, 1962.
- Miskawayh, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad, Taġārib al-umam, Henri Amedroz (ed.), Širkat al-Tamaddun, Cairo, 1915.
- al-Muhtārāt min al-rasā'il*, Ğulam-Ridā Ṭāhir, İraq Afsār (ed.), Mawqūfāt-i duktur Maḥmūd Afsār Yazdi, Tehran, 1378.
- al-Muqaddasī, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, Aḥsan al-taqāsim fi ma'rifat al-aqālīm, M. J. de Goeje (ed.), Brill, Leiden, 1906.
- Narṣahī, Muḥammad b. Ğa'far, Tārīḥ-i Buḥārā, M. Riḍawī (ed.), Sanā'i, Tehran, 1317.
- Niśāpūrī, Zāhīr al-Dīn, Salğūq-nāma, A. Morton (ed.), The Gibb Memorial Trust, Warminster, 2004.
- Niẓām al-Mulk, Abū al-Ḥasan, Siyāsat-nāma, Muḥammad Qazwīnī (ed.), Tahūrī, Tehran, 1334 (English Translation H. Darke: The Book of Government or Rules for Kings, Routledge, Kegan Paul, London, 1960).
- al-Qalqašandī, Aḥmad b. 'Alī, Şubh al-a'sā fi śinā'at al-inṣā, vol. 10, al-Maṭba'a al-Amīriyya, Cairo, 1916; Dār al-Kutub al-'Ilmiyya, Beyrouth, 1987.
- al-Qummī, al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad, Tārīḥ-i Qum, Ğalāl al-Dīn Ṭihrānī (ed.), Tūs, Tehran, 1341.
- al-Rāwandī, Muḥammad b. 'Alī, Rāḥat al-sudūr, Muḥammad Iqbāl (ed.), Luzac, Brill, London, Leiden, 1921.
- al-Rūdrāwārī, Abū Śuğā' Muḥammad, Dayl kitāb taġārib al-umam, part III in Ibn Miskawayh, Taġārib al-umam.
- al-Ṣābi', Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm, Dīwān al-rasā'il, 2 vols., İhsān Dūnnūn al-Ṭāmirī (ed.), al-Furqān, London, 2017.
- al-'Urbī, Abū Naṣr, Ğurfādaqānī, Abū al-Šaraf Nāṣih, Tarġuma-yi Tārīḥ-i yamīnī, Ğa'far Śī'ār (ed.), Bungāh-i tarġuma wa-našr-i kitab, Tehran, 1345.
- al-'Urbī, Abū Naṣr, Tārīḥ-i yamīnī, Yūsuf al-Hādī (ed.), Mīrāt-i maktūb, Tehran, 2008.

Secondary Sources

- Bosworth, Clifford Edmund, "Mazyad, Banū", EI², VI, 1991, pp. 965–966.
- Bosworth, Clifford Edmund, "Ukaylids", EI², X, 2000, pp. 786–787.
- Busse, Heribert, Chalif und Großkönig. Die Buyiden im Iraq (945–1055), Orient-Institut der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, Beirut, 1969.
- Cahen, Claude, "L'évolution de l'iqtā' du IX^e au XII^e siècle : contribution à une histoire comparée des sociétés médiévales", Annales ESC 8, 1, 1953, pp. 25–52.
- Cahen, Claude, "Notes pour l'histoire de la himāya", in Mélanges Louis Massignon, I, Institut Français de Damas, Damas, 1956, pp. 287–303.
- Chelhod, Joseph, "Himā", EI² III, 1971, p. 393.
- Drechsler, Andreas, Die Geschichte der Stadt Qom im Mittelalter (650–1350): politische und wirtschaftliche Aspekte, Klaus Schwarz, Berlin, 1999.
- Franz, Kurt, "Resources and Organizational Power: Some Thoughts on Nomadism in History", in Stefan Leder & Bernhard Streck (eds.), 2005, pp. 55–77.
- Franz, Kurt, Vom Beutezug zur Territorialherrschaft : das lange Jahrhundert des Aufstiegs von Nomaden zur Vormacht in Syrien und Mesopotamien 286–420/889–1029, Reichert, Wiesbaden, 2007.
- Franz, Kurt, "The Bedouin in History or Bedouin History?", Nomadic Peoples 15, 1, 2011, pp. 11–53.
- Franz, Kurt, "Annāzids", EI³, forthcoming.
- Heidemann, Stefan, Die Renaissance der Städte in Nordsyrien und Nordmesopotamien. Städtische Entwicklung und wirtschaftliche Bedingungen in al-Raqqā und Harrān von der Zeit der beduinischen Vorherrschaft bis zu den Seldschuken, Brill, Leiden, 2002.
- Herrmann, Gottfried, Persische Urkunden der Mongolenzeit, Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, 2004.
- Imber, Colin, Ebu's-su'ud. The Islamic Legal Tradition, Edinburgh University Press, Edinburgh, 1997.

- Lange, Katharina, "Shawāyā. Economic Mélange, Pure Origins? Outsiders' and Insiders' Accounts of Tribal Identity in Northern Syria", in Stefan Leder & Bernhard Streck (eds.), 2005, pp. 99–122.
- Leder, Stefan, Streck, Bernhard (eds.), Shifts and Drifts in Nomad-Sedentary Relations, Reichert, Wiesbaden, 2005.
- Mottahedeh, Roy, Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society, Tauris, London, New York, 2001.
- Paul, Jürgen, Die politische und soziale Bedeutung der Naqšbandiyya in Mittelasien im 15. Jahrhundert, De Gruyter, Berlin, 1991a.
- Paul, Jürgen, "Forming a Faction. The Himāyat system of Khwāja Ahrār", IJMES 23, 5, 1991b, pp. 533–548.
- Paul, Jürgen, "The Seljuq Conquest(s) of Nishapur: A Reappraisal", Iranian Studies 38, 4, 2005, pp. 575–585.
- Paul, Jürgen, "The Role of Khwārazm in Seljuq Central Asian Politics, Victories and Defeats: Two Case Studies", Eurasian Studies 6, 2007–2008, pp. 1–17.
- Paul, Jürgen, "Khidma in the Social History of Pre-Mongol Iran", JESHO 57, 3, 2014, pp. 390–420.
- Paul, Jürgen, Lokale und imperiale Herrschaft im Iran des 12. Jahrhunderts. Herrschaftspraxis und Konzepte, Reichert, Wiesbaden, 2016a.
- Paul, Jürgen, "Nomads and Bukhara. A Study in Nomad Migrations, Pasture, and Climate Change (11th century CE)", Der Islam 93., 2, 2016b, pp. 502–538.
- Paul, Jürgen, "Hasanwayh b. al-Husayn al-Kurdi (r. ca. 350–369/ca. 961–979). From Freehold Castles to Vassality?", in Deborah G. Tor (ed.), The 'Abbasid and Carolingian Empires. Comparative Studies in Civilizational Formation, Brill, Leiden, 2018, pp. 52–70.
- Peacock, Andrew, Early Seljūq History: A New Interpretation, Routledge, London, 2010.
- Pomerantz, Maurice, Licit Magic. The Life and Letters of al-Šāhib b. 'Abbād (d. 385/995), Brill, Leiden, 2018.
- Sato, Tsugitaka, State & Rural Society in Medieval Islam. Sultans, Muqta's & Fallahun, Brill, Leiden, 1997.

