

ANNALES ISLAMOLOGIQUES

en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne en ligne

AnIsl 19 (1983), p. 1-8

Doris Behrens-Abouseif

The Qubba, an Aristocratic Type of zāwiya [avec 2 planches].

Conditions d'utilisation

L'utilisation du contenu de ce site est limitée à un usage personnel et non commercial. Toute autre utilisation du site et de son contenu est soumise à une autorisation préalable de l'éditeur (contact AT ifao.egnet.net). Le copyright est conservé par l'éditeur (Ifao).

Conditions of Use

You may use content in this website only for your personal, noncommercial use. Any further use of this website and its content is forbidden, unless you have obtained prior permission from the publisher (contact AT ifao.egnet.net). The copyright is retained by the publisher (Ifao).

Dernières publications

9782724710885 Musiciens, fêtes et piété populaire
9782724710540 Catalogue général du Musée copte
9782724711233 Mélanges de l'Institut dominicain d'études orientales 40
9782724711424 Le temple de Dendara XV

9782724711417 Le temple de Dendara XIV
9782724711073 Annales islamologiques 59
9782724711097 La croisade
9782724710977 ???? ??? ???????

Christophe Vendries
Dominique Bénazeth
Emmanuel Pisani (éd.)

Sylvie Cauville, Gaël Pollin, Oussama Bassiouni, Youssef
Hamed
Sylvie Cauville, Gaël Pollin, Oussama Bassiouni

Abbès Zouache
Guillemette Andreu-Lanoë, Dominique Valbelle

THE QUBBA, AN ARISTOCRATIC TYPE OF ZĀWIYA

Doris BEHRENS-ABOUSEIF

In their chronicles of the Circassian Mamluks, Ibn Taġribirdī and Ibn Iyās, both mention a type of religious foundation — the qubba — the identification of whose function presents some difficulty.

The term qubba, meaning dome, is not applied in these texts as a mere description of the appearance of any domed construction. Rather, as will be demonstrated, it designates a certain type of building having not only the shape of a dome, but also a specific function, a function inextricably linked to the life of the court and to sufi practice ⁽¹⁾.

In Cairene medieval architecture, the dome is used not only in religious or funeral architecture, i.e., in mausoleums, over prayer niches and ablution fountains, but also in palaces, belvederes and garden pavilions. The palace of the vizir Ya'qūb Ibn Kilis, the belvedere of Qubbat al-Hawā' (both Fatimid), the palace of al-Šāliḥ at Rawḍa and the hall of Sultan al-Nāṣir Muḥammad at the Citadel were all secular domed structures ⁽²⁾.

Despite extensive use of the dome in Cairene architecture, however, Maqrīzī, in his enumeration of religious foundations in Cairo, mentions only two buildings under the label of qubba. One of them is the dome of Sultan al-Šāliḥ Naḡm al-Dīn Ayyūb, erected after his death (1250) by his wife, Šaġar al-Durr, and the other is the dome of Sultan al-Manṣūr Qalāwūn, a mausoleum the Sultan had built within his complex of madrassa and hospital (1285). Besides being royal mausoleums, both domes fulfilled other functions of a ceremonial character : it was at the dome of al-Šāliḥ that the nomination of a new amir used to take place, a function later transferred to the dome of Qalāwūn, which was also a site for sufi gatherings ⁽³⁾.

⁽¹⁾ This does not apply to architectural epigraphy, where the term qubba is usually used for any domed structure.

⁽²⁾ al-Maqrīzī, al-Mawā'iz wa'l-I'tibār bi-Dikr al-Ḥiṭaṭ wa'l-Āṭār (Būlāq : 1270), I, p. 487; II, p. 8.

Creswell, K.A.C., The Muslim Architecture of Egypt (Oxford : 1959), II, p. 87.

Ibn Iyās, Badā'i' al-Zuhūr fī Waqā'i' al-Duhūr, 2nd. ed. (ed.) M. Mostafa (Cairo-Wiesbaden : 1961), V, p. 441.

⁽³⁾ al-Maqrīzī, Ḥiṭaṭ, II, pp. 374, 380 f.

Besides these two qubba(s), Maqrīzī mentions among the list of zāwiya(s) a zāwiya called Qubbat al-Naṣr ⁽¹⁾, founded in the Fatimid period and restored by Sultan al-Nāṣir Muḥammad. Ibn Baṭṭūṭa records that the sufis of Cairo used to hold their gatherings in qubba(s) ⁽²⁾; he fails to make clear, however, whether these were mausoleums or zāwiya(s).

One of the most interesting references to a qubba in the Mamluk period appears in Ibn Taḡribirdī's «Ḥawādīṭ» in the biography of Amīr Ġānibak al-Dawādār, Governor of Jadda ⁽³⁾. The historian is particularly fascinated by the qubba-foundation (867-1462) of Ġānibak and his almost legendary bustān, which is described as covering an area of 120 faddān(s) ⁽⁴⁾ stretching from his palace at Qanāṭir al-Sibā' to the Nile shore opposite the Island of Rawḍa at Manṣa'at al-Maharānī. The bustān, with gates at both ends of the area encompassed, is reported by Ibn Taḡribirdī as the most fabulous Egypt had known since the Tulunid bustān of Ḥumārawayh, so often described by historians. At the edge of his bustān, near a Nile-side platform and pool, Ġānibak juxtaposed two qubba(s) of unequal size (see Pl. I).

The historian further reports that at the domes Ġānibak settled foreign sufis (fuqarā' min al-a'ḡām), whom he provided with generous allowances. Ibn Taḡribirdī does not, however, refer to the place as ḥanqā or zāwiya. Ibn Iyās, on the other hand, uses the term zāwiya once in reference to Ġānibak's foundation, but otherwise it is consistently called simply qubba ⁽⁵⁾.

Ibn Taḡribirdī dedicates two complete pages of his chronicle to the description of a banquet (walīma) given at these domes by the amir, without, however, indicating the purpose of this great reception. The description of Ġānibak's banquet, besides being interesting in itself, may shed some light on the function of such qubba(s).

DESCRIPTION OF THE BANQUET (résumé).

Ġānibak, 'Aẓīm al-Mamlaka (the Great Man of the Kingdom), invited to his banquet at his dome at Manṣa'at al-Maharānī, all the notables, the qādī(s), the mubāširīn

⁽¹⁾ Ibid., p. 433.

⁽²⁾ Riḥlat Ibn Baṭṭūṭa al-Musammāh : Tuḥfat al-Nuẓẓār fī Ḡarā'ib al-Amṣār wa 'Aḡā'ib al-Asfār (Cairo : 1958). I, p. 20.

⁽³⁾ Ibn Taḡribirdī, Ḥawādīṭ al-Duhūr fī Madā al-Ayyām wa'l-Šuhūr (ed.) W. Popper (Berkeley, California : 1932), pp. 566-69; 766-68.

Idem, al-Nuḡūm al-Zāhira fī Mulūk Miṣr wa'l-Qāhira (ed.) J. Šayyāl / F. Šaltūt (Cairo : 1972), XVI, p. 323.

Ibn Iyās, Badā'i', II, pp. 406, 449.

⁽⁴⁾ Nowadays one Egyptian faddān equals ca. 4,200 M².

⁽⁵⁾ Ibid. p. 409.

(secretaries), the amirs and the hāsiqiyya (his ministers). He also invited the fuqarā' of all the sufi orders, each group sitting separately at the platform without mingling with other sufi groups. Coran readers performed their recitations inside the great dome. An enormous crowd filled the park at the platform, while amirs were posted on the way to the qubba to prevent the access of the masses. In the afternoon, the host had a lavish banquet served to himself and the notables inside the dome, and to the fuqarā' outside on the platform. The banquet lasted until the afternoon prayer, when Ġānibak started politely bidding farewell to most of his guests. He then sat at the platform in company with the fuqarā' and a select group of the notables.

A multitude of lamps flooded the party with light. They were hanging from posts erected for that purpose along the platform. In addition, a great ship anchored on the Nile shore in front of the dome was covered from top to bottom with lanterns. Also, the dome, in spite of its large size, was completely illuminated, together with its minaret. The celebration lasted until dawn, the lights (between 5,000 and 10,000 candels) still burning until then. It was, according to Ibn Taġribirdī, the most famous of all nights, nothing like it ever having been seen before! Its memory seems also to have impressed Ibn Iyās, who compares the number of lanterns burning at a feast celebrated by Sultan al-Ġūrī at his palace at Rawḍa with the lights of Ġānibak's banquet some forty years earlier.

In his description, Ibn Taġribirdī refers only to the large dome, although he previously mentioned two qubba(s) erected by Ġānibak on this site. It is not stated if the occasion for the party was a religious one, but it is obvious from this report that the fuqarā' were less prominent guests than the notables and amirs with whom Ġānibak sat at the banquet within the dome. In Ibn Iyā's version there is mention of muġanni (singers) and qaṣaf (fun and amusements).

YAŠBAK'S DOMES ⁽¹⁾.

Under the reign of Sultan Qāyṭbāy almost a decade later (1477), another mighty amir, Yašbak min Maḥdī, also a dawādār, similarly erected a qubba on the outskirts of Cairo near Maṭariyya, a place of excursion for amirs and sultans for generations. This dome is mentioned several times by Ibn Iyās in connection with banquets, receptions and excursions that were participated in by the sultan, amirs and high-ranking guests, and which included music and dance (probably in a sufi context).

⁽¹⁾ For the history of the domes, Behrens-Abouseif, Doris, « The North-eastern Extension of Cairo Under the Mamluks », Annales Islamologiques, t. XVII (1981), pp. 171-183.

Two years later, the same amir erected a second qubba on a larger scale in the northern suburb but closer to the city. It was connected with a number of residential structures, gardens and a pool dug «for the view», the whole complex overlooking a panorama. This dome, like the earlier one, is very richly decorated inside but has a plain exterior, a combination of features distinguishing it from most contemporary funeral domes. It, too, is mentioned in the context of plaisance visits of the sultan and the amirs.

The domes of Yašbak were clearly not mausoleums, never being mentioned as anything other than qubba(s) or Qubbat Yašbak. The Coranic inscription of the first smaller dome (Sur. 76/5-9) refers to water and is often applied to sabīl(s), while the only surviving inscription of the second dome commemorates the pilgrimage of Sultan Qāyṭbāy, as do several other inscriptions on buildings of this period.

Architectural comparison of the domes of Yašbak with the domes of Ġānibak, on the one hand, and with an earlier dome built by Barsbāy and a slightly later dome built by Šayḥ Damirdāš al-Muḥammadī ⁽¹⁾ — both of which were zāwiya(s) — on the other hand, strongly suggests that the domes of Yašbak were also a type of zāwiya, although they are not referred to as such by the historians. This interpretation is supported by Ibn Iyā's single reference (noted above) to Ġānibak's foundation as zāwiya. Similarly, Ġānibak's domes could not have been mausoleums, inasmuch as the context in which they are mentioned does not refer to any funeral function. Moreover, the actual mausoleum dome of Ġānibak, which survives in the cemetery (Index Nr. 171), is referred to by the historians as turba, not qubba ⁽²⁾.

Later travellers describe the domes of Yašbak as connected to dwellings for sufis. Yet neither contemporary nor later sources associate Yašbak's domes with the name of a certain šaiḥ or a certain sufi order, as zāwiya(s) generally are. The domes of Ġānibak, now no longer extant, are, however, reported to have been used in the Ottoman period by the order of the Baktāšīyya and to have been known as Takiyyat Qaṣr al-ʿAynī. They acquired this name because al-Šahābī Ibn al-ʿAynī had dwelt nearby in a palace formerly belonging to Ġānibak that eventually gave its name to the entire quarter ⁽³⁾.

⁽¹⁾ For an architectural comparison, Behrens-Abouseif, Doris, «Four Domes of the Late Mamluk Period», Annales Islamologiques, t. XVII (1981), pp. 191-201; «An Unlisted Monument of the Fifteenth Century: The Dome of Zāwiyāt al-Damirdāš», Annales Islamologiques, t. XVIII (1982), pp. 105-115.

⁽²⁾ Ibn Taġrībī, Ḥawādīt, p. 769.

⁽³⁾ Ibn Taġrībī, Ibid., pp. 496, 541.
al-Nābulī, ʿAbd al-Ġanī, al-Ḥaqīqa waʾl-Mağāz fī Riḥlat al-Šām wa Miṣr waʾl-Ḥiğāz 1105/07, Ms. Dār al-Kutub ʿUğrāfiā, Nr. 344, p. 102 v.
Mubārak, ʿAlī, al-Ḥiṭaṭ al-Ġadīda al-Tawfīqiyya, Būlāq 1888, VI, p. 56; Čelebī, Ewliyā, Siyāhatnamesi, X : Misir, Sudān, Habes; Istanbul 1938, p. 243 ff.

The question arises whether or not we are dealing, as far as these qubba(s) are concerned, with a special type of zāwiya. The zāwiya in the Mamluk period ⁽¹⁾ developed into an independent kind of structure which, though small in scale and indefinite in architectural features, was always connected to a particular šaiḥ who represented a specific order (ṭarīqa). The zāwiya was used by the šaiḥ as residence for himself and his family. Sometimes, though not always, the šaiḥ would be buried in his zāwiya, which then would become a place of pilgrimage for his adherents and acquire the character of a mašhad.

In contrast to the institutionalized sufism of the ḥanqā, which by the mid-fifteenth century had become fully integrated with the madrassa, the sufism of the zāwiya was usually popular. Still sufi šaiḥ(s) did not automatically represent the poor classes but were often associated with the life of the court, and Ibn Taḡribirdī, himself an aristocrat, tries to defend some šaiḥ(s) against popular accusations of having attached themselves to the rulers, or leading an unorthodox style of life ⁽²⁾. The šaiḥ(s) of the zāwiya often preferred being financially and socially independent of the rulers in spite of endowments they might receive from them. The šaiḥ(s) not only enjoyed the respect of rulers, but, thanks to their influence upon the masses, were sometimes even feared by them.

The qubba seems to have been a quite different sort of sufi foundation from the type of popular institution that is commonly represented as zāwiya. Qubba(s) were aristocratic foundations and maintained an aristocratic and ceremonial character closely connected with the personal use of the sponsor and consequently more subject to his control. This difference might explain the reluctance of the historians to call them simply zāwiya(s). The term qubba, used instead, certainly implies more than the mere definition, of the shape of the building, as noted above, since all mausoleums of the period were domes and yet were generally not designated by this term.

Such a foundation is exemplified again in Ibn Iyās, who reports that during one of his excursions to the outskirts of Cairo, Sultan Qāyṭbāy stopped at a place called al-Marḡ wa'l-Zayyāt, which pleased him so much that he decided to establish a zāwiya there. This zāwiya was known as Qubbat Muṣṭafā ⁽³⁾, and its šaiḥ must have enjoyed the confidence of the sultan, since Qāyṭbāy sent him as ambassador to the Ottoman court.

The connection of sufism with a certain royal style of life was in the middle ages an established tradition. In the Fatimid period the Caliph al-'Azīz attached at Qaṣr al-Andalus at the cemetery a belvedere where he could sit and watch sufi dances performed by candlelight on a carpeted stage built for that purpose. Following the performance a banquet was given by the Caliph and robes of honor offered ⁽¹⁾.

⁽¹⁾ Fernandes, Leonor, «The Zāwiya in Cairo», Annales Islamologiques, t. XVIII (1982), pp. 116-121.

⁽²⁾ Ibn Taḡribirdī, Ḥawādīṭ, p. 379 f.

⁽³⁾ Ibn Iyās, Badā'i', III, pp. 181, 315 f.

Sultan al-Nāṣir Muḥammad established his great hippodrome with its complex of palaces built for his hunting excursions and polo tournaments at Siryāqūs near the ḥanqā he had founded there, the most prominent sufi foundation of the Bahri Mamluk period ⁽²⁾. Similarly, Sultan Īnāl is reported to have settled a sufi ṣaiḥ at the belvedere of al-Tāğ, built by the Fatimid Caliphs overlooking the Ḥalīğ and later restored by Sultan al-Muʾayyad Ṣaiḥ as a residence for himself ⁽³⁾.

The foregoing circumstances concerning the foundation of the qubba(s) do not conform with the character of the zāwiya and sufi life, ascetic and humble, as described by Ṣāʾrānī in the later part of the fifteenth century. Neither were these foundations part of a funeral-religious complex, comprised of the founder's mausoleum, a ḥanqā and madrassa, together with a Friday mosque. Simple Friday mosques in the late Mamluk period mostly included sufi gatherings (ḥuḍūr), but these qubba(s) do not seem to have been Friday mosques in the usual sense, although the qubba of Yašbak at Maṭariyya had Friday prayer. The qubba seems rather to be an aristocratic type of sufi-foundation or aristocratic zāwiya, distinct from the popular zāwiya of Ṣāʾrānī's hagiographies. A place where sultans and amirs and their guests could attend sufi performances in an atmosphere of leisure.

It is possible that sufi performances had acquired an artistic character and came to be looked at within aristocratic circles as an aspect of culture, worth being integrated into the plaisance and cultural scheme of court life, especially if the fuqarāʾ sponsored by the rulers were aʿḡām, i.e., foreigners. This function of sufi performance seems to have been already established in the Fatimid period, hence the above-mentioned platform and belvedere built for that purpose. The connection between sufi practice and plaisance may also allow the simple interpretation of being a religious cover to royal leisure. In any case, the existence of the qubba foundation reflects the complexity within the aspects of sufi life in the late Mamluk period and represents its architectural expression.

ARCHITECTURAL NOTE ⁽⁴⁾.

Thanks to the unexpected circumstances ⁽⁵⁾ which brought to light nineteenth century photographs of the domes of Ġānibak at Qaṣr al-ʿAynī, it is now possible to establish

⁽¹⁾ Maqrīzī, Ḥiṭaṭ, I, p. 486.

⁽²⁾ Ibid. II, pp. 199, 422.

⁽³⁾ Ibn Tağrībī, Ḥawādīṭ, p. 216 f.

⁽⁴⁾ S. n. 1 p. 4.

⁽⁵⁾ I am particularly grateful to Mrs. Laylā ʿAlī Ibrāhīm and to Dr. Maḥmūd el-Manāwī for having given me these photographs (Pl. I-II).

an important series of Mamluk buildings displaying a type of architecture which so far has not been considered within the typology of Cairene architecture.

These domes are :

- the dome of Maʿbad al-Rifāʿī, built by Sultan Barsbāy at the cemetery around 1433 (called zāwiya in its waqf document);
- the two domes of Ġānibak at Qaṣr al-ʿAynī, 1462 (Pl. I and II, A-B);
- the dome of Yašbak min Maḥdī near Maṭariyya, 1477;
- the dome of Yašbak min Maḥdī north of Ḥusayniyya, 1479;
- the dome of Zāwiyat al-Damirdāš, built before 1496 in the northern outskirts of Cairo.

All these domes are sufi foundations, without a funeral character (except that the dome of Zāwiyat al-Damirdāš includes the tomb of the founder). The architecture of these domes differs from that of most contemporary mausoleum domes in that they are built of brick carried by large squinches, they lack the accentuated transitional zone of funeral domes, and their exterior is plain.

This means that the plan of the single domed chamber existed in Cairo about the same time as in western Anatolia, where it characterizes the architecture of early Ottoman mosques. This raises the question whether or not there exists any direct connection between both types of architecture.

Besides having in common their single domed construction, there is not enough architectural evidence to support an argument in favor of an exchange of patterns between the early Ottoman domed chamber and the Cairene qubba. In spite of their partial distinction from funeral dome architecture, the buildings in question remain closely linked with Mamluk dome tradition : the pointed silhouette of the domes being typical for that period. Also, the use of a squinch instead of the more frequent triangular pendentives does not immediately imply early Ottoman influence, since it was only scarcely used there and was soon abandoned in favor of the pendentives.

The difference in style between the funeral domes and the qubba(s) discussed herein should instead be interpreted by the differences in their respective functions.

The mention of a zāwiya, built in the Fatimid period and known as Qubbat-al-Naṣr, indicates that the tradition of domed zāwiya(s) did not start in the fifteenth century, but much earlier.

The domes of Ġānibak at Qaṣr al-ʿAynī before their destruction last century to make place for the hospital (The large dome overlooks the Nile).

A. — The dome of Ġānibak overlooking the Nile (1462).

B. — Squinch of the large dome of Ġānibak at Qaṣr al-ʿAynī.