Murder in the Palace Poetical Reflections

I

In the final years of the Faṭimid Dynasty, the Imâms had to concede most of their ruling power to the Viziers. The Viziers frequently succeeded each other on the Vizieral throne. The frequency with which this took place is quite astonishing. Often the reigning Vizier was dismissed from his function by rebellious Amîrs who then took power by setting themselves up as people to be nominated by the Imâm as the next official Vizier of the Dynasty.

It is possible that an Imâm would only have a very small chance of resisting the nomination of an unsuitable new Vizier, by using his personal army, the special guard of the Imâm.

But success was not always guaranteed and murders happened frequently at the Fâṭimid Court in Cairo.<sup>1</sup>

1.1

This is a good point to mention the murder of a certain Vizier at the instigation of his Imâm. A strange way, you might think, for an employer to get rid of one of his employees!

The murder was successful and the father of the murderer became the next Vizier.

The Imâm in question was al-Zâfir; the Vizier who became the victim was named 'Alî ibn al-Salâr. Not long after this, the same Imâm al-Zâfir wanted the same murderer to commit an even more daring murder against another Vizier, the man who had followed the recently murdered Ibn al-Salâr on the vizieral throne. The murderer was named Naṣr, and the man to be murdered on this occasion was a certain Amîr named 'Abbâs, who was none other than Naşr's very own father. The murderer and his father did not come from the usual circles around the Court of al-Qâhira; instead, they had arrived in Egypt as exiles, or as we would say nowadays, as asylum-seekers.

<sup>1</sup> A short paper (unpublished) on the subject of this article was presented by the present author at the Tenth Colloquium on the History of Egypt and Syria in the Fatimid, Ayyubid and Mamluk

1.2

The Imâm had disposed of one of his Viziers relatively easily, but to get rid of the succeeding Vizier in a similar manner, was not quite so easy.

In this instance Naşr had to commit murder against his own father, something which few sons would readily perform. But the Imâm must have thought this deed to be within the bounds of possibility, provided that he maintained a friendly relationship with the son of the Vizier in question. This may well explain why the Imâm constantly tried to seduce the son by an impressive presentation of gifts, both in cash and in kind.

But 'Abbâs, the intended victim, and the father of the would-be murderer, was successful in turning the tables upon the Imâm. In fact, he persuaded his son Naşr to change the victim of the plot and murder the very man who had given the initial command to commit the murder!

1.3

Of course there is more to all this than simple blood lust in the mind of one Vizier. In the background a struggle for power was going on between three groups or institutions: on the Imâm's side there was his special guard of some 600 men, the şibyân al-khâşş which was a specially-trained guard appointed to protect him.

On the Vizier's side there were the hujariyya, a guard composed of young Amîrs to be, who had been chosen by the Vizier al-Afdal ibn Badr al-Jamâlî to provide protection against the Frankish Crusaders.

And finally there was a special group designed to protect the Viziers against murderous attacks coming from members of the Imâm's Court. These hardy soldiers were the şibyân al-zarad (young soldiers in suits of mail).

These soldiers were employed inside the Imâm's Palace. They had an important role to play in the spacious îwân, and in the closed-in underground meeting room, the sirdâb, which was only accessible by means of dark corridors.

The şibyân al-zarad had been appointed by the far-sighted Vizier Ibn al-Salâr in order to protect himself against murderous attacks which might occur during a compulsory audience with the Imâm at which the Vizier was supposed to greet the Imâm and to give him his respects.

If you take all these forces into account, you will see that perhaps the only manner left by which an Imâm could dispose of a Vizier would be to have him murdered.

In the latter days of the Fâtimid period it was not possible for an Imâm to arrange the affairs of the dynasty and the State on his own authority. On the contrary the Imâm was either walled-in, intra muros, or kept indoors, mahjûr.

1.4

In the Dîwân of ‘Umâra al-Yamanî (515-569 / 1121-1174) as well as in historical sources, we find many interesting details regarding the end of the Fâtîmid Dynasty and the hesitant beginnings of the following Ayyûbid Dynasty.

‘Umâra himself was an outsider. He had been uprooted from his home in far-off Yemen because there, in the little town of Zabîd, a struggle for political power was going on which caused him to leave the region and move to Mecca. Fortunately the well-known ambassadorship of Mecca was created by the Sharîf of Mecca especially for ‘Umâra. He travelled first to Egypt and there he encountered the Fâtîmid Dynasty in a state of ever-growing chaos.

Some months before the arrival of ‘Umâra, the Imâm al-Zâfir had been murdered by the son of his own Vizier. This incident had not been the starting point of a quick change of careers for Imâm and Vizier, but rather the continuation of an unfortunate existing practice, one of the hazards experienced by a chain of Viziers as they exercised their function in al-Qâhira.

1.5

First we should call to mind the rough and uncultured manners of the Amîr Ibn al-Salâr who was of Sunni persuasion in a Shî‘ite environment. In order to set out on his career as a Vizier, he had caused his predecessor to be murdered. Ibn al-Ṭuwayr says: “He seized [the previous] Vizier Ibn Maṣâl and killed him and caused his head to be carried into al-Qâhira, while his [Ibn al-Salâr’s adopted] son held it on top of a spear shaft.”<sup>2</sup>

We will use this Vizier Ibn al-Salâr as the starting-point for our discussion of the intrigues at the courts of the Imâm and the Vizier in al-Qâhira.

First, however, it is necessary to refer to the works of Ibn al-Athîr which give a comprehensive overview of the impression made upon later generations by the last period of the Fâtîmid Dynasty.

Moreover Ibn al-Athîr also mentions a key figure within this Dynasty who managed not only to murder a certain Fâtîmid Imâm, but also the brothers and a nephew of the same Imâm. These incidents were a clear indication that the end of the Dynasty could not be far off.

Stuttgart 1992, p. 56-57. For a general overview (outdated but still useful), see F. Wüstenfeld, Geschichte der Fatimiden-Chalifen. Nach Arabischen Quellen, Göttingen 1881, p. 312-327.

However it is interesting to note that Ibn al-Athîr is the only historian to imply that the murderer, the “key figure” came from an undesirable background. He does this by indicating that the key figure had been a khayyât (a kind of tailor) at the outset of his career, only later becoming a Fâtimid official.<sup>3</sup>

3

In a chapter dealing with the murderous attack on ʿĀlâʾiʿ and the Vizierate of his son Ruzzîk, we find Ibn al-Athîr making interesting remarks.

The following account by Ibn al-Athîr indicates that the murderous attack by Naşr was successful:

“In that year [449 H], in the month of Muḥarram, Ibn al-Salâr the Vizier of al-Zâfir was murdered.

“His stepson (rabîb) ‘Abbâs ibn Abî l-Futûḥ ibn Yaḥyâ al-Şanhâjî [and the latter’s son Naşr] were involved in this murder. Moreover the Amîr Usâma ibn Munqidh had perhaps his own reasons for suggesting this murder.

“The Caliph [Imâm] al-Zâfir for his part gave permission to Naşr son of ‘Abbâs to commit the murder.

“Naşr entered al-‘Âdil’s [Ibn al-Salâr’s] palace where his grandmother lived. She [who was called Bullâra] was the mother of ‘Abbâs.

“Ibn al-Salâr died and his stepson (rabîb) ‘Abbâs became Vizier after his death. ‘Abbâs was like a stranger in Egypt. He had arrived from the Maghrib, as we have said, and he came to Mişr (Egypt).

“He had learned the tailoring business (khiyâta) and he became a good tailor (khayyât). But when Ibn al-Salâr married ‘Abbâs’ mother [Bullâra], he liked his stepson and gave him a good education.”

<sup>3</sup> The profession of khayyât was perhaps held in low esteem by the public of those times. However, the Book of Professions does not give any reference to a bad background, see Takhrîj al-dalâlat al-samʿiyya ʿalâ mâ kâna fî ʿahdi Rasûl Allâh ṣallâ Allâh ʿalayhi wa-sallama mina l-ḥiraḥ wa l-ṣanâʾiʿ wa l-imâlât al-sharʿiyya, li-Yaʿlâ ibn Muḥammad ibn Suʿûd al-Khuzâʿî, edition Iḥsân ʿAbbâs, Beirut 1985, p. 709. There we find only a reference to one ʿUthmân ibn Ṭalhâ who was a khayyât, who took asylum with the Prophet. In the Lisân al-ʿArab, sub voce: khiy, the word khaytu bâṭil has an unfavourable meaning and was also used as a surname indicating unsubstantiality, or untrustworthiness as characterising a human person, in casu the Umayyad Caliph Marwân ibn al-Ḥakam. See Lisân al-ʿArab, sub voce: kh y t, where we find the following concerning khaytu bâṭil:

“This is the light which penetrates through a small peephole in a door. One says it is ‘thinner than a khayt bâṭil.’”

according to Thaʿlab. Another opinion is as follows: ‘Khayt bâṭil is that by which the saliva of the sun is called; and the twisted thread of the Devil (luʿâbu al-shams wa-mukhâṭu l-shayṭân). [The Umayyad] Marwân ibn al-Ḥakam had a surname deriving from this because he was tall and confused [like tangled thread] (tawīlan muḍṭariban).’ The poet said:

‘May Allâh keep at a distance a clan which has given power to someone called Khayt Bâṭil, to whom power over / the people has been given. Such a one gives to whom he wishes and withholds from whom he wishes.’

Ibn Birrî said: ‘Khayt bâṭil is the thread which appears from the mouth of a spider.’ Aḥmad ibn Yaḥyâ said: ‘Someone is subtler than khayt bâṭil.’ And he said: ‘The khayt bâṭil is the floating dust which enters through a peephole when the sun is glowing hot. This is a proverb for someone whose affairs are of very little importance.’”

However at this juncture the narrator Ibn al-Athîr says pointedly:

“The stepson recompensed the other [i.e. the stepfather] by murdering him, after which he took over the government.

“The Vizierate in Egypt always came into the possession of the one who seized power.

“The Caliphs (i.e. the Imâms) were behind the Chamberlains (i.e. the eunuchs) but the Viziers were like the possessors.

“After Vizier al-Afdal [ibn Badr al-Jamâlî], it almost never happened that somebody reigned unless it was through war and murder and the like.

“Therefore we mention them in their own little biography.

“Allah knows best.”<sup>4</sup>

4

As to Vizier Ibn al-Salâr, he had taken power by force; and the Imâm al-Zâfir had to agree to accept him as the new Vizier.

It gradually became clear to Ibn al-Salâr however, that the Imâm was not particularly happy about this change. We read in the history by Ibn al-Ṭuwayr for example that the Vizier had a certain fear of the dark corridors in the Imâm's palace.<sup>5</sup>

Although Ibn al-Salâr was himself a very violent person, he saw to it that from now on—or rather, during his Vizierate—the Imâm held audiences in another place offering less danger.

About the relationship between the new Vizier Ibn al-Salâr and Imâm al-Zâfir we read the following:

“The Amîr Abu l-Ḥasan ‘Alî Ibn al-Salâr was one of the hujariyya. His father was a Kurdish person from the Zirzârî clan who had arrived in Egypt where he had been given the honorific title ‘Guest of the Dynasty’” (Dayf al-Dawla).

“His son ‘Alî ibn Salâr [the future vizier] was taken and transferred to a sort of barracks for young cadets (ṣibyân al-hujar).”<sup>6</sup>

At this point, the phenomenon of the cadets at the barracks should be explained. An elite corps—the hujariyya—had originally been established by the well-known Vizier al-Afḍal after an unsuccessful attempt by him to free the Sâhil [the Levant coast] from the Franks. This unfortunate event was apparently much regretted by al-Afḍal.

Another historian, the author of the Nuzha gives us a more precise idea of how the barracks were introduced by al-Afḍal the son of Badr al-Jamâlî.<sup>7</sup>

From this historian we learn:

“Abu l-Qâsim al-Afḍal Shâhinshâh ibn Amîr al-Juyûsh Badr al-Jamâlî took upon himself the Vizierate. He showed himself to be even more severe and more tenacious than his father. He was handling the affairs in his absolute authority just like his father used to do.

“People wrote to al-Afḍal from their place in Ascalon (‘Asqalân) about a mustering of the Franks. Al-Afḍal took it upon himself to approach that town.

“As for the acquisition of money, weaponry and horses, he did not leave any possibility unused.

“He established his brother al-Muẓaffar [Abû Muḥammad Ja‘far ibn Amîr al-Juyûsh Badr] as his representative when dealing with the Imâm. He planned to save the Levant Coast (al-Sâhil) from the domination of the Franks.”

5.1

“He arrived at Ascalon and marched up to it with that army. But he was let down by (khudhila min jihati) his own army which was an army appointed for this expedition (nawbat al-naṣṣa).

“Al-Afḍal understood that the cause of his failure could be found in the state of his own fighting men (jund). When he had been beaten he burned all of the equipment which was with him.

“The Franks had a poet on their side who had tried to ingratiate himself with them.

“Therefore the poet said in addressing Şanjîl (Saint Gilles) the King of the Franks—and may Allâh the High One curse them:

Poem to rhyme şanjali, metre mutaqârib

فَلَّاهُ دُرُكًا مِنْ صَنْجَلٍ	نَصَرْتُ بِسَيْفِكَ دِينَ الْمَسِيحِ
بِأَقْبَحَ مِنْ كَسْرَةِ الْأَفْضَلِ	وَمَا سَمِعَ النَّاسُ فِيمَا رَوَاهُ

<sup>1</sup> By your swords you supported the religion of the Messiah (Masîḥ); therefore, by Allah, how excellent you are Oh Saint Gilles (şanjâl)!

- 2 Among all the things told to them, the people had never heard of anything more serious than the defeat of al-Afḍal.

“Al-Afḍal succeeded later on in butchering this poet. None of the soldiers was of any further use to al-Afḍal after this expedition (nawba).

“Al-Afḍal cancelled their honorific titles (naʿt-s) and their word was no longer heard after that.”<sup>8</sup>

5.2

“He established seven barracks for the cadet corps (hujra-s) and from the sons of the soldiers he chose three thousand men whom he divided between these barracks.

“For each one hundred men he installed one steward (zimām) and one officer (naqīb).

“The entire operation was administered by one Amīr who was called al-Muwaffaq (the Successful).

“Everything which they needed—horses, weaponry and other things—he gave them gratuitously.

“Because of them he did not need the (other) soldiers any more. In cooperation with the Zimām al-Akbar (the head steward), the Muwaffaq, he made them ready for any problem which might arise.”<sup>9</sup>

“After all this, keeping watch and guarding became restricted to Ascalon alone. This remained protected by a rota of patrols (badal) who were sent over to that place from the standing armies and from the fleet. In the meantime the Dawla became gradually weakened by differences of opinion (ikhtilāf al-ārāʾi).

“It was difficult for the soldiers to maintain that town; and the affair became too large for them, since in the end they had no alertness, being occupied with their own business.

<sup>8</sup> Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 3-4. See on the several expeditions of the Vizier al-Afḍal in order to restore the situation in Palestine, Steven Runciman, A History of the Crusades. II. The Kingdom of Jerusalem and the Frankish East 1100-1187, Harmondsworth 1965, p. 76-90, where among other points of importance there is information on these expeditions over the years 1102, 1103 and 1105. The name Šanjil as it occurs in the poem quoted, may refer to Raymond of Saint-Gilles. He was the original Count of Toulouse who in 1104 had constructed nearby Tripolis in Lebanon the huge castle Mount Pilgrim, but to the Arabs the identical castle was known as Qalʿat Šanjil, thus according to Runciman, op. cit. vol. 2, p. 60: “Raymond was determined to conquer Tripoli itself. During the last months of 1103 he set up a camp in the suburbs of the city and began to construct a huge castle on a ridge, some three miles inland. (...) By the spring of 1104 it was completed and Raymond was in residence. He called it Mount Pilgrim (Mont-Pèlerin); but to the Arabs it was known as Qalʿat Šanjil, the castle of Saint-Gilles. (...) Raymond himself was injured by a burning roof which fell on him. (...) never fully recovered from his burns six months before, [he] fell mortally ill. He died at Mount Pilgrim on 28 February 1105.”

Cf. Taqī al-Dīn Aḥmad b. ʿAlī al-Maqrīzī, Ittiʿāz al-ḥunafā bi-akhbār al-aʾimma al-Fāṭimiyyīna l-khulafāʾ, ed. Muḥammad Ḥilmī Muḥammad Aḥmad, Cairo 1973, vol. III, 43, where it says about the besiegers of Tripoli (sub anno 502 H / 1108-1109 AD): “their commanding officer (muqaddam) was Raymundu bnu Šanjil”. This personage must have been either Raymond’s nephew William-Jordan who had succeeded when Raymond had died, or the latter’s son Bertrand who had just arrived from France. See also Runciman, Crusades II, 69-70, and René Grousset, L’Épopée des croisades, Paris 1958, p. 51-53 and 58-60. In 1109 AD, Guillaume Jourdain died of an arrow shot just after Tripoli had finally surrendered, only then could Bertrand take possession of all his father’s inheritance. For Mons Peregrinus, see Wolfgang Müller-Wiener, Burgen der Kreuzritter im Heiligen Land, auf Zypern und in der Agäis, Aufnahmen von A.F. Kersting, München 1966, p. 44-45.

“The Franks brought pressure upon the city until they took it in the year 548 H.

“Two years before that moment I heard a man speaking about this situation. That man said, ‘In the year 8, Ascalon will be taken, but with the assurance of safe conduct (amân).’”<sup>10</sup>

5.3

It is clear that the hujariyya was a group who received education in various skills. The Nuzhat al-muqlatayn tells us:

“Everyone received his education in the techniques of the different sorts of crafts and sciences which the Dawla was in need of, namely courage, horsemanship (furûsiyya) and the like.”<sup>11</sup>

“When a boy (ṣabî) among them became an adult he received a complete set of equipment which he had to keep with him so that there would be no impediment if he were sent on an expedition.

“Their manner is like that of the Templars (Dâwiyat al-Firinj).”<sup>12</sup>

“When somebody from among them becomes very good at something for which he was sent out, then he is promoted to be an Amîr and to become the Governor of some place. Of a similar kind as this was the career of ‘Alî Ibn al-Salâr.”<sup>13</sup>

“He possessed boldness, courage, decisiveness and disinvolvement of the soul [i.e. asceticism] turning away from pleasure and licentiousness.

“He surpassed his contemporaries and was proud of his wealth and tended towards the madhhab [school of law] of the people of the Sunna [and this in a predominantly Shî‘ite milieu].

“He tried to approach them via that madhhab. The mass of the people were inclined positively toward him.”<sup>14</sup>

<sup>11</sup> Regarding furûsiyya, part of the science of horsemanship consisted of polo, a game common with the Ayyubids, the Mamlûks’ predecessors, and played in the hippodromes, see G. Rex Smith, Medieval Horsemanship. A Fourth-Century Arabic Cavalry Manual, London 1979.

<sup>12</sup> On the institution of the Ṣibyân al-hujar and on Ibn al-Salâr, see Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 57, 58 and the note of the editor. As to the Templars, they formed a religious as well as a military Order. In 1118 AD, they were installed in a wing of the royal palace of King Baldwin I, whose palace was at that time situated in the mosque al-Aqsa. Just like the Hospitaliers, the jamâ‘atu l-isbitâriyya, they were officially founded as religious organisation; however, one of the first duties of the Order was to protect the road from the coast to Jerusalem from incursions. The founder of the Order was a knight from Champagne (France) called Hugue de Payens (circa 1070-1136 AD). See, for instance, Steven Runciman, A History of the Crusades II, p. 157-158, 312-314, 318-319; René Grousset, L’épopée, p. 78.

When Ibn al-Salâr was in Alexandria as Governor, a young boy (ṣabî) arrived from Ifrîqiya (Tunisia) whose name was ‘Abbâs b. Abî l-Futûḥ b. Yaḥyâ b. Tamîm b. al-Mu‘izz b. Bâdîs al-Şinhâjî. He was accompanied by his mother whose name was Bullâra. As to his father Abu l-Futûḥ, he had accompanied them both, but had died shortly after their arrival in Alexandria, thus leaving behind his (according to the sources) very attractive wife with her little child.

“Ibn al-Salâr heard tell of her (khavar) and sent a messenger to her to ask her to become betrothed to him; and then he married her.”<sup>15</sup>

The family who had been adopted by the Vizier in such a friendly manner came from al-Mahdiyya, a well-known fortified town on the shores of the Mediterranean. In the meantime however, al-Mahdiyya had been threatened and perhaps been besieged by the Christian overlords, and it is therefore conceivable that they had arrived in Alexandria as refugees, supposedly between the years 509-515 H.<sup>16</sup>

‘Alî b. Yaḥyâ b. Tamîm b. al-Mu‘izz b. Bâdîs, Sulţân Abu l-Ḥasan al-Şunhâjî and King of the West (i.e. present-day Tunisia) was born in al-Mahdiyya, in Şafar in the year 499 H. This date is also found in Ibn Khallikân, Wafayât, but ‘Uyûn al-tawârîkh gives it as for 479 H.

“He [‘Alî, reigned 509-515] died in the month of Rabî’ II in the year 515 H. He took the kingship upon himself at the death of his father. The father had been stern and decisive; a man of decision and courage (shahâma).

“He had delegated the command to his son al-Ḥasan [515-?] from whom the Franks have taken al-Mahdiyya. Al-Ḥasan was the last of the Sultans.”

The following fragment of poetry belongs to ‘Alî b. Yaḥyâ:

1. Through her pretty dallying (dalâli-hâ) and her figure straight as a spear, a woman robbed me of my senses.
2. Thereupon she desired a union with me, whereat I satisfied my cravings through her. I remained lying between her throat and her wrists.

3. Never have I experienced any greater sweetness than that of this union. Oh how pleasant is the reunion which comes after the decision to part.

“His father Yaḥyâ b. Tamîm, had installed him [‘Alî] as Governor of Sfax. But when his father was suddenly dying—which will be mentioned in its rightful place under the letter yâ’ if Allah permits—the notables of the Dawla gathered together in order to compose a written message which they addressed to him on the authority of his father, so as to command him to come quickly to him. The letter reached him whereupon he quickly set out. With him was a group of the Amîrs of the ‘Arab. He forced himself to travel fast and he reached them. He entered the palace on Thursday the second day of the Festival (yawm al-‘îd). That was the day that his father died. He let nothing distract him except the preparations for the burial of his father. He performed the ṣalât (for the dead) over him and buried him.

“On the morning of Friday 13th Dhu l-Hijja in the year 509 H he [‘Alî] held an audience for the people. They came inside and greeted him as Amîr. He went riding in the middle of his people and armies.

“In his days, his brother Abu l-Futûḥ, son of Yaḥyâ, set out for Egypt. With him was his wife Bullâra.”

“She was the daughter of al-Qâsim and her little son ‘Abbâs was still at her breast. And he arrived in Alexandria. He stayed there and was hospitably received (wa-unzila wa-ukrima). At the command of al-Âmir [died 524 H], the master of Egypt (Şâhib Miṣr), he stayed there for a short while and then he died. After his death, Bullâra the above-mentioned wife married al-‘Âdil ‘Alî ibn al-Salâr and ‘Abbâs grew up. Al-Ḥâfiz, the subsequent master of Egypt made him a General

7

In historical sources the son ‘Abbâs is often described as al-Rabîb (the One to be Educated, i.e. the Adopted Child) and it seems that he was highly esteemed by Ibn al-Salâr, for the latter saw to it that his Rabîb—who was also called ‘Abbâs al-Şinhâjî by historians—was promoted as Governor of the Province of Gharbiyya.

Regarding the high position which this Rabîb received under the lordship of Ibn al-Salâr, there is an explanation in the History of the Patriarchs of the Egyptian Church which possibly accounts for the exceptionally favourable treatment of the Rabîb. This states that the Rabîb was: “an Amîr of the rank of those kings who had connections with the Arabs, he was named ‘Abbâs and he was of the children of the Amîr Tamîm ibn Bâdîs; he became Governor in al-Gharbiyya. His mother whose name was Ballûra became the wife of this ‘Alî ibn al-Salâr. (... Wa-kâna amîr min jins mulûk al-mulimmîn bi l-‘Arab yusammâ ‘Abbâs min awlâd al-amîr Tamîm ibn Bâdîs wâliyan bi l-Gharbiyya wa-kânat ummuh ismuhâ Ballûra zawjat hadhâ ‘Alî ibn al-Salâr fa-lammâ...).”<sup>17</sup>

This indicates that the original position of ‘Abbâs’ family was an elevated one. The Rabîb did not belong to the children of the barracks, whilst Ibn al-Salâr himself had been one of those low-class people. In fact Governor Ibn al-Salâr came from the hujariyya that is, from a totally different background.

8

“When Amîr Sayf al-Dîn Abu l-Ḥasan ‘Alî Ibn al-Salâr arrived in al-Qâhira in the month of Sha‘bân in the year 544 H—or, it is also said in the month of Rajab in the year 543 H—the Imâm al-Zâfir bi Amr Allâh was compelled to grant him an audience. As was customary he clothed him with the Vizierate, and the new person received the honorific title (laqab): al-‘Âdil Sayf al-Dîn Nâşir al-Ḥaqq (Righteous One, Sword of Religion, Supporter of the Truth).”<sup>18</sup> There is a certain ambiguity about the last title which could mean: Supporter of the Imâm—or, Supporter of the Shî‘ite Religion.

“He began with an inspection of the affairs of the soldiers, those known for their energy and their decision-making. He augmented their salaries, inspected the armouries, and treated (qaddama-hu). He ruled over the Vizierate after the death of the above-mentioned al-‘Âdil.”

Compare also al-Maqrîzî, Itti‘âz III, 105, sub anno 517 H, where it says:

“In that year there arrived a messenger from the Amîr Tâj al-Khilâfa Abû Manşûr Ḥasan (ibn ‘Alî ibn Yahyâ ibn Tamîm ibn Mu‘izz ibn Bâdîs) Lord of al-Mahdiyya informing him [al-Âmir] about his adherence to the [Fâtimid] Dynasty, and about the fact that Rujâr ibn Rujâr, Lord of Siqilliya, was continuous in his damaging action as he had already prepared to wage war against himself. He asked him [al-Âmir] to lead an expedition towards Rujâr in order to prevent him [Rujâr] from that action.”

<sup>17</sup> For the Rabîb ‘Abbâs, see the History of the Patriarchs of the Egyptian Church Known as the History of the Holy Church, by Sawîrus ibn al-Muḳaffa’, bishop of al-Ashmûnîn, vol. III, part I Macarius II-John V (AD 1102-1167), translated and annotated by A. Khater and O.H.K. KHS-Burmester, Cairo 1968, p. 43 Arabic text (p. 72 English translation). See also for ‘Abbâs, P. their (the Imâms') religious ceremonies (nawâmîs) with respect. But he was fanatical in his favouring of the law school of the Sunna (shadda min madhhab al-sunna).

"But in his soul there was desolation vis-à-vis the Imâm al-Zâfir bi Amr Allâh and so he was on his guard against him.

"He selected men who rode beside his stirrups. They were in suits of mail, with helmets on, to the number of six hundred.<sup>19</sup>

"Ibn al-Salâr arranged them into two patrols with two commanders: one patrol per day. He had a suspicion (wahm) that the Caliph was keeping certain people lying in wait for him within the palace in order to assassinate him.<sup>20</sup>

"Thus al-Zâfir bi-Amr Allah's audience with him was transferred from the hall which one could enter only via darkened corridors (dahâlîz) to an open audience chamber (îwân) with much more sunlight and more space. All those people mentioned (i.e. the Men in Suits of Mail) came inside together with him.

"The Imâm al-Zâfir sat facing him in the shubbâk (a kind of balcony) which was visible (al-zâhir) from the inner side of the îwân."<sup>21</sup>

9

"In the first instance, Sayf al-Dîn 'Alî Ibn al-Salâr with the honorific title (na't) 'al-Malik al-'Âdil' (the Righteous King), the Vizier to al-Zâfir bi Amr Allah al-'Ubaydî, Overlord of al-Diyâr al-Mişriyya, was great in his own soul and in his pride. He was very tyrannical and violent, and also daring in the shedding of blood.

"In spite of this, he nonetheless tended to exaggerate when serving al-Zâfir bi Amr Allah.

He showed obedience to him even though they mutually avoided each other. He did nothing but good, both in the Imâm's absence and in his presence. So there was no disapproval, and no argument gripped him in this respect.<sup>22</sup>

"The son of his wife [Bullâra], his adopted son Amîr 'Abbâs b. Abi l-Futûḥ al-Şinhâjî was his guide and gave him advice about al-Zâfir bi Amr Allah."<sup>23</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 59, and al-Maqrîzî, Itti'âz III, 198-199; according to Ibn al-Furât these were the 'Men of the Suits of Mail' (şibyân al-zarad); see also Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, ed. Ayman Fu'âd Sayyid, Beirut Stuttgart 1992, p. 95 note 1, and op. cit., p. 165 note 3.

<sup>20</sup> According to Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 63, Ibn al-Salâr feared the Imâm's Guard, that is the elite corps of young soldiers especially educated and devoted to the service of the Imâm, called şibyân al-khâṣṣ. Later on, Ibn al-Salâr tried to eradicate this group of soldiers, by open murder or exile to remote provinces, where they were to be murdered secretly. This led to an enhancement of the feelings of hatred and revenge from the side of the Imâm and his şibyân al-khâṣṣ.

<sup>21</sup> Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 59.

was quite different: the Vizier did as if he executed the commands of the Imâm. This appears from his wording as given by Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 63: "Thus, whenever he arrested one of them, he killed him. But al-Zâfir didn't say one word to him about it, because Ibn al-Salâr would only say: 'Our master (mawlânâ) is not guilty of this, and did not agree to it (the threatened murderous attack upon Ibn al-Salâr). I did not do it except for those reasons.' But anger grew in al-Zâfir's heart with regard to the question of his şibyân al-khâṣṣ and the acts of murder perpetrated upon them. And his hatred for al-'Âdil ibn al-Salâr increased."

10

Amîr ‘Abbâs, the Rabîb, had married in the meantime, and had a son from this marriage who was called Naşr and who had been granted the honorific title (laqab) Nâşir al-Dîn. Unwisely, as things turned out, the Vizier Ibn al-Salâr also felt kindly disposed towards the son of his stepson (rabîb), who was almost a grandson to him.

“He gave him much respect in the house (dâr) of his grandmother [Bullâra] who was still the wife of the Vizier.”<sup>24</sup>

10.1

It is impossible from our own place in history to assemble many details about this young man; but what is certain is that Naşr son of ‘Abbâs al-Şinhâjî went on to develop into a criminal. Perhaps because in his youth he had encountered so many intrigues, he later developed a definite taste for murder.

In the Nuzhat al-muqlatayn, we find a description of relationships between the son of the stepson, and the Imâm al-Zâfir, and between the Imâm and his Vizier Ibn al-Salâr.

“Al-Zâfir bi-Amr Allah Master of Egypt was very much attracted to Naşr Nâşir al-Dîn son of ‘Abbâs, with an inclination as a result of which he became notorious, in such measure that he [the Imâm] asked for his [Naşr’s] opinion, and carried it out.”<sup>25</sup>

Another witness to these events exists: Usâma,<sup>26</sup> a family friend and someone well conversant with the affairs of the Rabîb. He provides us with more details; and in what he says there is a suggestion of a politically bad relationship between the Imâm al-Zâfir and the Vizier Ibn al-Salâr. In this connection, it is interesting to hear what Usâma said to the stepson Rabîb:

“Send someone [i.e. your own son] to the Imâm in order to ask him if you, ‘Abbâs, may become the Vizier. Because your son does not contradict him, he is suitable for the plan-making of al-Zâfir. For the latter harbours an enormous hatred against Ibn al-Salâr. There is sufficient evidence of this in the fact that he has been entrusted with the Vizierate up until this very day, without ever setting eye upon al-Zâfir, and without answering any question which he might put to him.

<sup>26</sup> According to both the authors Ibn al-Ṭuwayr (Nuzha, p. 61) and al-Maqrîzî (Itti‘âz III, p. 198), the complete name of Usâma is as follows: Usâma ibn Murshid ibn ‘Alî ibn Muqallid ibn Naşr ibn Munqidh al-Kinânî, his honorific name is Mu‘ayyad al-Dawla Majd al-Dîn. According to Usâma’s own writing, he had first arrived in Egypt in 539 H, under the regime of the Fatimid Imâm al-Ḥâfiẓ ‘Abd al-Majîd. Al-Ḥâfiẓ died in 544 H and his reign had continued for some 20 years since the murderous assault on his predecessor Imâm al-Âmir. See for Usâma’s arrival in Egypt, Kitâb al-I’tibâr li l-amîr Abi l-Muzaffar Mu‘ayyad al-Dawla Majd al-Dîn Usâma ibn Murshid ibn ‘Alî ibn Munqidh al-Shayzarî al-Kinânî al-Kalbî 488-584 H, ed. Qâsim al-Samarrâ’î, Riyad 1987, p. 29; and Memoirs of an Arab-Syrian Gentleman or An Arab Knight in the Crusades, Translated from the Unique Manuscript by Philip K. Hitti (Princeton 1929) Beirut 1964.

“Should al-Zâfir answer the wish of your son in a positive way, then your son ought to enter without Ibn al-Salâr noticing him, and should murder him as soon as he is alone with him. For, obviously, he can always have free access to him.

“And then, when he has killed him, his [the dead man’s] blood will remain unimportant. For there is no blood revenge; for there is no-one who will ask after him. Then you can acquire the Vizierate.”

“These words found a willing ear with ‘Abbâs and an open mind. He invited his son Amîr Nâşir al-Dîn Naşr into his tent and suggested to him everything that he intended.

“The same night he sent his son to Cairo.” [The father and the son were waiting at that time with their army in front of Balbays.]<sup>27</sup>

10.2

This Naşr ibn ‘Abbâs would mastermind the killing of at least one Vizier and one Imâm. With his taste for murder he became a prime mover in developments in and around the two palaces belonging to the Imâm and the Vizier. While discussing these murderous attacks we should also take note of the reflections of the Ambassador, the poet ‘Umâra al-Yamanî, who arrived in Egypt shortly after these events in order to settle there and develop his career as a court poet.<sup>28</sup>

10.3

After this introduction it should now be clear that the futures of the Vizier and the Imâm in al-Qâhira were uncertain. Clearly, careers and lives could be interrupted by deposition or murder. Moreover, anyone who was murdered should not expect a dirge to be dedicated to him. A deposed or murdered Vizier like Ibn al-Salâr was, in the eyes of subsequent Viziers, not worth more than an ordinary executed court official.

The only exception to this is the still to come Vizier Ṭalâ’î. After a rough-and-ready attempt to murder him, he nevertheless managed to stay alive for one day—or some hours, at any rate—and this delay enabled him to deal with government affairs from his death bed. Ṭalâ’î will become the subject of many funeral elegies from the poet ‘Umâra. Some of these poems were composed immediately after his death, some after an interval of one or more years on the anniversary of the death, and some on the occasion of the transfer of the bodily remains from the precincts of the Vizieral palace to their final resting place in the graveyard.

<sup>28</sup> ‘Umâra al-Yamanî, see for instance, al-Maqrîzî, Itti’âz III, 224. He was a poet and a Shâfi’î faqîh who originated from the neighbourhood of the city of Zabid in Yaman. His name in full is as follows:

Najm al-Dîn Abû Muḥammad ‘Umâra ibn Abi l-Ḥasan ‘Alî ibn Zaydân al-Ḥakamî, from the town of Murṭân in the Wasâ’ valley in Yaman. He arrived in the month Rabî’ First, of the year 550 H in Egypt; and this visit to Egypt was for the first time; he came as an ambassador from the Amîr of Mecca, named Qâsim ibn Hâshim ibn Fulayta. Later having returned to Yaman, he came to Egypt for a second time, this being in the year 552 H. According to Muḥammad Ḥilmî Aḥmad, the editor of the Itti’âz, ‘Umâra served within the court circles of the Fatimid Imâms, but allegedly kept adhering to his Summa persuasion. He remained in Egypt for a long time up till 569 H when he died at the orders of Saladin. The poet is said to have fallen under suspicion of trying to restore Fatimid rule over Egypt.

Now however we must return to the situation in the palace several years before the appearance of Ṭalā'i'.

The Vizier 'Alī ibn al-Salār was certainly a violent man but he also made careful plans for the defence of the Dawla against attacks from outside. Obviously in this connection we should think of attacks from the Crusaders "the Franks, may Allah cast them off from Himself (al-'adûw al-makhdhûl mina l-Firinj)!"<sup>29</sup>

The Fâtîmids were able to point with some pride to their occupation of the South Levant, which we could describe as the coastline of Greater Syria, using modern terminology. There, they held in their possession the important city-fortress of Ascalon.

"The Vizier Ibn al-Salār was very much preoccupied with the business at Ascalon in order to stop it from being breached for he knew very well that the Franks wished to possess it. He carried provisions and weapons in great amounts."<sup>30</sup>

"In the meantime, there were more and more messages about the Franks saying that they were going to lay siege to Ascalon. For this they had gathered horses and men from over land and sea.

"The Vizier commanded that an army should be assembled under the direction of the Rabîb 'Abbâs. After this however he kept 'Abbâs waiting outside the outer walls of Balbays."

According to the author of the Nuzhat al-Muqlatayn:

"The Vizier commanded that the army would assemble at that place commanded by Amîr Rukn al-Islâm 'Abbâs. And thereafter he retained him on the outside of Balbays."<sup>31</sup>

"After that he organised soldiers to travel towards Ascalon, namely 10,000 archers and 20,000 infantrymen.

"And he caused the stores which he was in need of to be carried in the galleys (shawânî). Only the army should still travel."

"And then at the end of each ritual prayer he added a personal prayer that Allah might not decide upon the occupation of Ascalon in his days."<sup>32</sup>

The purpose of this waiting was to ensure that the troops would only proceed to Ascalon when the supply transport of provender for man and animal had been brought inside the fortified harbour by galley (shawânî). The army would not travel until the last moment.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>31</sup> This town was continually besieged by armies as they were attempting either to enter Egypt or to retreat from it. See G. Wiet, article Balbays in Encyclopaedia of Islam Second Edition.

<sup>32</sup> Ibn al-Ṭuwayr, Nuzha, p. 60-61 and p. 95 note 2, the remark on shînî, plural shawânî, meaning a galley propelled by up to 140 oars (mijdâf). According to V. Christides, we must assume that in the Arab warships there was one rower for one oar

(see on this, Dionisius A. Agius, "The Arab shalandî" in Egypt and Syria in the Fatimid, Ayyubid and Mamluk Eras III, eds. U. Vermeulen and J. van Steenbergen, Leuven 2001, p. 47-60). The shînî was larger in size than the shalandî (an average of 150 oars is assumed for the shînî). The shînî was perhaps a transport ship like the Byzantine dromon, and would have carried 1000 men on each vessel.

In his Nuzhat al-muqlatayni, the historian Ibn al-Ṭuwayr is the only source to mention a rather touching story about Ibn al-Salâr. According to this author, the Vizier performed a number of ṣalât each day; and at the end of each ritual prayer he added a personal prayer of his own, a du‘â directed towards Allah to the effect that: “Allah would not decide upon the seizure of Ascalon within his lifetime.”

And the historian adds “Allah took heed of his prayer and this is what happened with these people.”<sup>34</sup>

In his subsequent report the historian mentions in what manner the prayer of Ibn al-Salâr was to be fulfilled. Indeed Ascalon was not seized in the days of this Vizier because he himself would be murdered by the disposal of Allah through the hand of the killer Naṣr son of Rabîb.

13

‘Abbâs incidentally belonged to the Division of the army which was sent to the fortress of Ascalon by the Vizier. On the road to Ascalon ‘Abbâs was kept waiting in front of the city-fortress of Balbays [which is half way between Cairo and present-day Port Said].

‘Abbâs complained a great deal about the Vizier within the hearing of a co-warrior, a certain Usâma. ‘Abbâs complained that he could not take part in the delights of al-Qâhira and also that he had to travel towards a dangerous enemy, namely the Franks.

Indeed on that occasion a plot to murder Ibn al-Salâr was constructed by the so-called grandson of Ibn al-Salâr, otherwise known as the son of Rabîb who was still young and headstrong.<sup>35</sup>

“Indeed the plan was executed. Naṣr travelled to al-Qâhira, because the military expedition would be too heavy for him to endure, as they say.”<sup>36</sup>

“Having arrived in al-Qâhira, he already knew how to enter by the secret harem porch into the residence of the Vizier as far as its innermost chambers (wa-dakhala ‘alayhi Nâṣir al-Dîn ibn ‘Abbâs min bâbi sirri dâri l-wizâra...).”<sup>37</sup>

<sup>36</sup> Ibn Muyassar, Akhlbâr Miṣr, p. 147, “And Naṣr went to the residence of his grandmother the wife of al-‘Âdil and informed al-‘Âdil that his father had allowed him to go from Balbays in compassion for him because of the expedition (shafaqatan ‘alayhi min al-safar).”

“By coincidence his grandmother Bullâra was absent for she had just gone to bathe in the ḥammâm. Indeed Naṣr was able to penetrate inside the bedchamber of his adopted grandfather, the Vizier.

“After a tiring day of organising the ships and their crews in order to strengthen the defences of Ascalon, the Vizier had thrown himself exhausted upon his bed.

“Naṣr however was so afraid that he only wounded the Vizier lightly, only in his foot. Ibn al-Salâr jumped up, asking: ‘You little dog, where are you (ilâ ayna yâ kulaybu)?’

Whereupon Naṣr ran outside in panic.

“His friends were there, asking what had occurred.”<sup>38</sup>

From the same source we know that the friends of Naṣr belonged to the special guard (ṣibyân al-khâṣṣ) of the Caliph. They were not companions in debauchery but had apparently been seconded to Naṣr ibn ‘Abbâs. From this it would seem that the Imâm supported the assassination attempt upon Ibn al-Salâr. They immediately concluded the worst and said: “You have already killed yourself and us!”<sup>39</sup>

They went back into the inner rooms. Inside, a chamberlain had arrived, an ustâdh, who stood speaking to the lightly-wounded Vizier.

The gang did not hesitate any longer: as one man they threw themselves upon the Vizier again, this time murdering him properly!

They then took his head away with them. In fact Naṣr himself took it outside to show it to the Imâm al-Zâfir. According to the Nuzha, “Naṣr took the severed head up and came to the portal of the [Imâm’s] Palace and showed it; whereupon it was drawn up into the Palace by using a rope (wa-akhadha ra’sahu wa-jâ’a ila bâbi l-qaṣri wa-aḏharahu fa-rufi’a ila l-qaṣri bi-ḥablin).”<sup>40</sup>

The story of the severed head spread like wildfire amongst the people of al-Qâhira.

“People were in great disorder,” says the historian. Naṣr is said to have sent the information of the Vizier’s elimination by carrier pigeon to his father, the Rabîb ‘Abbâs, who was still waiting with his army outside the walls of Balbays (wa-mâja l-nâsu fi l-Qâhira fa-sarraḥa l-tâ’ira li l-waqtî bi-ṭalabî ‘Abbâs min Balbays).<sup>41</sup>

13.1

The end of this story is that ‘Abbâs seized the power and was confirmed as Vizier and later installed by the Imâm al-Zâfir.

The head was carried to al-Zâfir who was in the Golden Porch (Bâb al-Dhahab) and looked down upon the head through an opening.

After that the head was set up so that people could see it. Then it was carried to the room where severed heads were stored (Khizânat al-ru’ûs) in the Financial Affairs building (Bayt al-Mâl). In the store-room the head was laid alongside the other heads which were already there.<sup>42</sup> “Those who were keeping calm in al-Qâhira were not disturbed because of the head; nor did anyone speak about it (wa-mâ taḥarraka la-hâ sâkinun wa-lâ takallama aḥadun).”<sup>43</sup>

13.2

The idea that nobody was bothered about the murder, or even that the inhabitants of Cairo were afraid to express any criticism, appears again in the report about the effect this murder had on the public, in the history of Ibn al-Ṭuwayr al-Qaysarânî, Nuzhat al-Muqlatayn. On page 64 the following remark is to be found:

“Al-‘Âdil ibn al-Salâr was murdered in his bed on Thursday, the 6th day of the month Muḥarram in the year 548, at the residence of the Vizier (Dâr al-Wizâra) in al-Qâhira, may it be well-guarded. It is also said that he was murdered on the 12th day of Muḥarram. Ibn al-Salâr passed away and no two billy goats thrust against each other with their horns in relation to his death (wa-dhahaba Ibn al-Salâr wa-lam yantaṭiḥ fî qatlihi ‘anazâni).<sup>44</sup>

“But he was still lauded; for that laudation had been performed already by Abû ‘Alî al-Maghribî with an ode whose opening lines spoke of the Imâm al-Zâfir, for such was the custom of poets (i.e. praising the Imâm in the first instance). He said the following:

١ يَا إِمَامَ الْحَقِّ قَدْ أَوْسَعْتَنَا مِنْكَ بِالْعَادِلِ عَدْلًا وَتَقَى
٢ الْقَنَا تَهْتَزُّ مِنْهُ خِيفَةً وَالطُّنَابِرُ عُدْمُنَهُ فَوْقًا

1 Oh Imâm of the [Shî‘ite] Truth, by presenting us with the person of al-‘Âdil [i.e. Ibn al-Salâr] you are generous towards us in righteousness and the fear of God.

2 The spears quivered for fear of him. But the lutes were missing for he was God-fearing.”<sup>45</sup>

The second line of this fragment is presumably an illustration of the orthodox attitude of this Sunna Vizier who was not a lover of worldly things such as music.

On the other hand, the Vizier had little time for the Shī'a Ahl al-Ḥaqq. However it is known from historical sources that he caused an orthodox Sunnî traditionalist of the Shâfi'ite madhhab to come to Egypt, and that this man, al-Ḥâfîz al-Silafî, arrived in Alexandria.<sup>46</sup>

13.3

Apart from the official poetry which we have been dealing with so far, there is some unofficial poetry which refers to the murdered Vizier in a more informal way.

There is for instance a lament by a highly professional mourning woman called Khusruwân who composed such moving compositions that people of her own time who were well-versed in literature felt great admiration for her.

Khusruwân compared the murdered Vizier in a very sympathetic manner to his namesake 'Alî, who at the very beginning of pristine Islam had once laid himself on the bed of the Prophet Mohammed in order to give the impression that it was the Prophet himself who was lying there—when in fact the Prophet was elsewhere, taking flight to Medina. Thus that 'Alî had been ready to risk his life for the Prophet.

The sobriquet Dhû l-Nûrayn, the Possessor of the Two Lights might refer to 'Alî as the father of Ḥasan and Ḥusayn. The comparison was not so far-fetched because the murdered Vizier was also called 'Alî.

However, according to H. Lammens, the title “Dhû l-Nûrayn” was known to be a surname for the Caliph 'Uthmân. Indeed the third Caliph was known under the identical sobriquet. As 'Uthmân died in his own home in Medina, and like 'Alî was a Companion of the Prophet, he might well have been intended as a point of comparison.<sup>47</sup>

Khusruwân's song was therefore quite ambiguous because 'Alî ibn al-Salâr was after all of Sunnite persuasion and could better be compared to 'Uthmân ibn 'Affân the “Shahîd al-Dâr” (The Martyr of the Residence) and “al-Bâb al-Maftûḥ” (The Door Left Open).

<sup>46</sup> According to al-Maqrîzî, Ittî'âz III, 198, al-'Âdil ibn al-Salâr was fanatic in his adherence to the creed of the people of the Sunna. He had been visited by the scholar of tradition al-Ḥâfîz Abû Ṭâhir Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad al-Silafî, for whom he had constructed the madrasa 'Âdiliyya in Alexandria. Abû Ṭâhir 'Imâd al-Dîn Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ibn Silafa al-Aṣbahânî was a scholar who had travelled in search of tradition materials and had thus visited many towns such as Iṣhahân, Baghdâd, Kûfa, Baṣra, Makka and Madîna. After travelling for about ten years, he settled in Alexandria in 511

H. From that time onwards he only left Alexandria if he wished to come to al-Qâhira in order to hear the ḥadîth personally. It is also said that he remained in Alexandria for an additional 65 years.

Silafa is a persian word, meaning someone with a split upper lip. Al-Silafî's grandfather has been described elsewhere as having a harelip which would explain his nickname. For more information on this, see note of the editor in Ittî'âz III, page 198. See also al-Ṣafadî, al-Wâfi VII, Stuttgart 1992, p. 351-356.

The lines of Khusruwân's mourning poetry sound very different from the sort of verse which we have grown used to with 'Umâra. For instance:

١ يَا قَتِيلَ الْغَفْلَةِ      يَا شَهِيدَ الدَّارِ
٢ يَا شَبِيهَ ذِي النُّورِ      مِنْ صَاحِبِ الْخُتَارِ

- 1 Oh you, the One who was murdered in sleep
Oh you, of this house, made a martyr
- 2 Oh you, who resemble the Master of Two Lights ['Uthmân]
He, the Companion of the Chosen One [Mohammad].<sup>48</sup>

There is another version of this lament; but we have of course no way of telling if Khusruwân added it to what she had previously said, or whether she said it instead of what is given in verse 1 above.

١ مَا تَقْبِلُ الْغَفْلَةَ      يَا شَهِيدَ الدَّارِ
٢ يَا شَبِيهَ ذِي النُّورِ      مِنْ صَاحِبِ الْخُتَارِ

- 1 Why accept this negligence [i.e. sleep]
Oh Martyr of this residence?<sup>49</sup>

The second verse is the same as in the first version.

13.4

Let us now return to 'Abbâs whom we left with his army at Balbays. It is clear that the reinforcement of the city-fortress of Ascalon had broken off completely. The Franks exerted themselves strenuously and seized the town, while the newly-installed Vizier 'Abbâs had obviously no time to spare for the arrangements needed to carry out such a complex military operation as the salvation of the town.

Insufficient food supplies for people and animals had been imported into the town. On the contrary, a small delegation came by ship to Ascalon to ask for some special sugar cane to be given to the pretty girls in Cairo to enhance their beauty.

The later historian al-Dawâdârî was of Sunni persuasion, as he makes very clear in his introductory remarks sub anno 549 H where he describes the strange incident of a ship coming to Ascalon to ask for sugar cane.<sup>50</sup>

Under the heading ‘Mention of the Caliphate of al-Zâfir ibn al-Ḥâfiẓ and a résumé of his biography’, on page 557, he says the following:

“He is Abu l-Manṣûr Ismâ’îl ibn Abi l-Maymûn ‘Abd al-Majîd al-Ḥâfiẓ and the rest of his genealogy (nasab) has already been mentioned. His mother was an umm walad and her name was Sitt al-Wafâ’.”<sup>51</sup>

Then on page 562, we are enlightened about the sugar-cane incident as follows:

“It is said that in this year the Franks became masters over Ascalon, after heavy fighting and fierce warfare. In this war many people were killed from among the two sides.

“The Muslims asked for safe conduct (amân) from the Franks.

“The reason for this was as follows: those who were in Ascalon, not being powerful enough against the Franks, had returned to Egypt several times to ask for help. They called to them for help and sought to be saved.

“While they were in this most terrible situation, waiting for rescue which was due from Egypt, for they had already shown great endurance, while they were in this situation, behold! a ship approached them from the direction of Egypt. They were happy and surmised that salvation would follow after it. But when it reached them, there alighted from that ship one voyager with a letter in his hand.

“He carried it towards the nâ’ib (substitute for Ibn al-Salâr) in Ascalon. And behold! therein was written the following:

“As soon as You take cognizance of this, and before You put it down from Your hand, You should send to us something, namely a rooted-stock of Persian sugar cane, from the sugar cane plantation of Ascalon. Take care that these are not too tough for budding young girls.’

“The nâ’ib replied:

“I hear and obey.’

“He waited assiduously until night and then went to the Franks and asked for safe conduct for himself and for the inhabitants inside the town. That did they grant to them. And then in the morning he opened the gate. And he gave the inner city over to the Franks.

<sup>50</sup> What al-Dawâdârî informs us about the Fâtîmids and their activities may help us form an idea of his personal inclination which was certainly anti-Shî’a, for under the year 549 H, we find him saying the following [Abû Bakr ibn ‘Abd Allâh ibn Aybak al-Dawâdârî, Kanz al-durar wa-jâmi’ al-ghurar, vol. VI, Al-durra al-muḍî’a fî akhbâr al-Dawla al-Fâtîmiyya, vol. VI, ed. Ṣalâḥ al-Dîn al-Munajjid, Cairo Wiesbaden 1961, p. 562]: “Al-Zâfir was the Caliph of Egypt until he was killed in the year 9 [i.e. 549 H] in accordance with what is still to be mentioned. In the year 8, the Ismâ’îlis changed the religion of Islam. They drank wine and behaved unchastly towards their daughters and their mothers and their sisters. And they did everything which was forbidden in the month of Ramaḍân, both at night and in the day. They set fire to the Jâmi’ (the ‘Amr ibn al-Âṣ mosque, the oldest mosque, in old Cairo) and all the shrines which were in their surroundings, and also the pulpits.”

<sup>51</sup> Abû Bakr ibn ‘Abd Allâh ibn Aybak al-Dawâdârî, Kanz al-durar wa-jâmi’ al-ghurar, vol. VI, Al-durra al-muḍî’a fî akhbâr al-Dawla al-Fâtîmiyya VI, p. 557. For a funeral poem on the decease of Sitt al-Wafâ, see P. Smoor, “‘Umâra’s Elegies and the Lamp of Loyalty”, AnIsl 34 (2000), 491 and 560-564.

“Now let them go to the Franks as the possessors of the town in order to ask on behalf of the nymph-like young girls.”

So the town was seized by the Franks in 548 H. This was much less painful for the Fâtimid Dynasty than it might have been, for shortly beforehand another severed head had been transported from Ascalon in the nick of time. This time we are not thinking of the head of yet another murdered Vizier, but the noble head of Ḥusayn, grandson of Mohammad. That head had been discovered a few years previously in a House of Prayer at Ascalon.<sup>52</sup>

Just before the town was conquered by the Franks the head was taken up again, ‘with a smell like musk, whilst its blood had not been dried up. After which, in a galley rowed by ten men (‘ushârî), the head was carried (...)’<sup>53</sup>

In al-Dawâdârî Kanz al-durar wa-jâmi‘ al-ghurar, there is a very simple explanation for the need for safe-conduct. It was essential to preserve the noble head of Ḥusayn; and safe-conduct (amân) of the head alone was requested. This was granted by the Franks in exchange for the voluntary surrender of the town. Al-Dawâdârî explains this saying:

‘The reason that the Franks took hold of Ascalon was linked to the fact that the head of Imâm al-Ḥusayn son of ‘Alî ibn Abî Ṭâlib (peace be upon them both) was transported through all the lands.’

And this ultimately led to occupation of Ascalon by the Franks.

“He had been interred in Ascalon close to the wall of the Jâmi‘ al-Qiblî between the two pillars.

“It remained there from that day up to this.

“This was reported to the above-mentioned ‘Abbâs when he held the function of his Vizierate on behalf of (the Imâm) al-Zâfir. And in his eye the report was genuine; he authenticated it.

“He exchanged messengers with the Franks; and between all of them it was agreed that he would deliver Ascalon to them, and that he would accept the noble head.

“The head was then transported to the Qâhira of al-Mu‘izz.

<sup>52</sup> This has already been discussed by Dr Daniel De Smet, “La translation du ra’s al-Ḥusayn au Caire Fatimide”, in Egypt and Syria in the Fatimid, Ayyubid and Mamluk Eras vol. II, editors U. Vermeulen and D. De Smet, Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta Leuven 1998, p. 29-44.

<sup>53</sup> See also in this connection the story of al-Ḥusayn’s head which is written over the door of the ancient minbar (pulpit) presently in the mosque at Hebron (Khalil). See Caroline Williams, “The Cult of ‘Alid Saints in the Fatimid Monuments of Cairo Part I:

The Mosque of al-Aqmar” in Muqarnas 1 (Yale University Press 1983), p. 37-52, especially p. 41:

“In 484/1091, Badr al-Jamâlî ‘discovered’ the head of al-Ḥusayn at Ascalon, the frontier city retained by the Fatimids along with a few other coastal cities after they had lost Syria and Palestine to the Sunni Seljuqs. The story of this discovery is detailed in a long Kufic inscription that adorns the beautiful minbar which embellished the mashhad in Ascalon [Later taken to the mosque of al-Ḥaram al-Khalil in Hebron.]”

“It was interred in the mausoleum of Ḥusayn (al-Mashad al-Ḥusaynî) in the month of Rabîʿ I, or as some say in Rabîʿ II, in 544 H [sic]. And that is the only right thing.

“It was transported in the company of Tamîm, known as al-Amîn, the Trustworthy.”<sup>54</sup>

The same explanation in different words is also found in the Ittiʿâz, where an additional report is given about the transport overseas of the noble head towards Cairo.

“The head was taken up... After which, in a galley (ʿushârî) rowed by ten men, the head was carried by the Khidma (members of the civil service) accompanied by some dignitaries, an Amîr and a Qâḍî.”

Both these personages supervised the transportation of the head. After a long journey they arrived in al-Qahira.<sup>55</sup>

Al-Zâfir, who was still alive at that time, consulted with the Ahl al-Bayt, which on this occasion would have meant his influential aunts and grandmother. The big question was, what should he do with the head? He was advised that instead of giving it to the Vizier, it would be better to place it in his own palace, the palace of the Imâm.

“Thereupon it was buried in the Qubbat al-Daylam (i.e. the cupola of the Daylam) inside the palace—in the portal (dihlîz) of the Administrative Service (khidma).”

<sup>55</sup> According to al-Maqrîzî, Ittiʿâz III, p. 207, note 3 the editor says: On a loose sheet of paper, the following text is added to the occurrences sub anno 548 H, “The information came in that the Franks persisted in the taking of Ascalon. Therefore he ordered the transfer of the head of al-Ḥusayn ibn ʿAlî ibn Abî Ṭâlib to al-Qâhira. Then, the head was dug up whilst emitting a smell like musk, whilst its blood was never dry. Thereafter it was carried in one of the ʿushârî s of the Service (khidma), and accompanied by Maknûn al-Khâdim. With the head departed also the amîr Sayf al-Mamlaka the reigning governor over Ascalon, and the qâḍî al-Muʿtaman ibn Miskîn. They travelled in it (the ʿushârî); thereafter they laid it (the head) in camphor. Then it was transferred inside via the underground hall (sirdâb) to the Emerald Palace (qaṣr al-zumurrud). Meanwhile, the Imâm al-Zâfir bi-Amr Allah Abu l-Manṣûr Ismâʿîl ibn al-Ḥâfîz had already constructed that mosque which is known today as the Mosque of the Fruit-sellers (jâmiʿ al-fakkâhîn), in order to deposit the head therein. Thereupon al-Zâfir gathered his ahl al-bayt and had a consultation with them. Then they advised him to position the head with them in the palace. So it was entered under the Cupola of the Daylam which formed part of the palace, and that was in the corridor of the Service (bi-dihlîz al-khidma). So it happened that everyone who entered along that corridor for the Service, used to kiss the floor in front of the tomb. They slaughtered there on each ʿashûrâ festival-day both camels and cows, and goats, and used to weep and lament abundantly, while they themselves used to blame those who had murdered him. They would continue to do so, until their Dynasty and State would cease to exist. The head arrived on Sunday the 8th day of Jumâdâ II, in that same year [548 H]. It was positioned inside the palace on Wednesday the 10th of that month. The Qâḍî Ibn al-Zubayr recited poetical lines to the rhyme-letter nûn (i.e. the abyât nûniyya, of which the following two lines...)” [see the lines quoted in the text below.]

13.5

What follows next is interesting because it tells us about the layout of things inside the palace of the Imâm. “Anyone who entered through that portal for affairs of the administrative service used to kiss the earth just in front of the grave.”<sup>56</sup>

Also of interest is the fact that “on each ‘Âshûrâ’ day they slaughtered camels and cows and small livestock. They wept and lamented very much and reviled him who had killed him (i.e. Ḥusayn).

“All this was continued until the Dawla (of the Fâtîmids) ceased to exist. The arrival of the head happened on Sunday, 8 Jumâdâ II. Finally it came to rest in the palace on Tuesday 10th.”

A Qâdî [the qâdî Ibn al-Zubayr] is alleged to have spoken some lines of poetry which, in translation, make something clear. However the words are not without a certain ambiguity. There may of course be an error in the precise wording. As it is, we have the following lines:

١ مالنا نطلب ما يفني ولا نطلب الأمن الذي يبقي لنا
٢ لهف قلبي على رءوس نقلت هو سواها هنا بعد هنا

- 1 Why do we hanker after that which destroys and why do we not search for the safe conduct which enables us to survive?
- 2 Oh, the sighing of my heart over the heads which have been transported, is there then happiness without a head, after a lifetime of humiliation?
[Oh, the sighing of my heart over the heads which have been transported. Can a headless person be fortunate after a lifetime of humility?].<sup>57</sup>

14

Although the palace of the Imâm may have gained in holiness because of this head, the behaviour of the Imâm al-Zâfir remained characterised by a certain amount of thoughtlessness.

In order to learn about the daily routine of this Imâm, it is necessary to take cognizance of certain details which are to be found in the annals.<sup>58</sup>

In the first place, however, it should be pointed out that here too there existed a certain tension in the palace. From the time when Ibn al-Salâr was still alive we receive reports which show that violent incidents—even executions—occurred outside the palace walls. There is, however, mention of one execution which did not come directly from the violent yet pious Ibn al-Salâr. We read the following which refers to the year 544 Hijra:

“In that year the head of the Fortunate of Fortunes, the Servant (Sa’îd al-Su’adâ’ al-Khâdim<sup>59</sup>), was thrown from the palace. And this happened on the 17th of Sha’bân. After this he was himself brought outside (i.e. without his head) and crucified upon the Bâb Zuwayla, close by al-Kharq (i.e. Bâb al-Khalq).”<sup>60</sup>

Obviously we are dealing here with the execution of a very highly-placed palace eunuch, a Servant or ustâdh muḥannak and very possibly the ustâdh Bayân is intended here. He was one of the servants of the palace, a freed slave dating from the time of al-Mustaṣṣir, one of the Imâms long since dead.<sup>61</sup>

This execution had been arranged by the Palace itself. But if we put this rather distasteful incident to one side for the moment and read further, we find that the Imâm Zâfir was able to indulge himself in many more interesting pleasures. Not only did he have the opportunity to pass the time in a splendid flower garden where on certain occasions a palace of roses was set up, but he was also able to take pleasure in the company of his white parrot, who was the possessor of great talents, such that he was able to recite part of the Koran.<sup>62</sup>

It appears in fact that the Imâm busied himself in the pursuit of pleasure. He took great delight in playing with young girl slaves and he was fond of listening to a certain male singer.

“In this manner”, says the historian, “there appeared a certain weakening, a breach in the Dawla... in his days the Franks took Ascalon into their own possession.” As a counterweight to all this worldly enjoyment, there was happily also “the Mosque which the Imâm had caused to be built in the lane of the meat-grillers.”<sup>63</sup>

<sup>60</sup> The head thrown from the palace window, see al-Maqrîzî, Itti’âz III, 200; and also less detailed in Ibn Muyassar, Akhbâr Miṣr p. 144, note 49.

<sup>61</sup> About a certain official under al-Mustaṣṣir, entitled Sa’îd al-Su’adâ’ who in vain tried to forestall the execution of the erstwhile Vizier al-Yazûrî, see Taqî al-Dîn al-Maqrîzî (died 845 H), Kitâb al-Muqaffâ al-kabîr, Beirut 1991, vol. III, p. 405. According to the editor Muḥammad al-Ya’lâwî the eunuch, the ustâdh muḥannak, Qanbar was intended as the Sa’îd al-Su’adâ’ who was by the Imâm al-Mustaṣṣir commissioned to prevent the execution. See parallel information in al-Maqrîzî, Itti’âz II, 242. Qanbar’s failure is not mentioned in M. Brett, “The Execution of al-Yâzûrî”, Egypt and Syria in the Fatimid, Ayyubid and Mamluk Eras II, 15-27.

<sup>62</sup> In fact the parrot is said to have been able to recite by heart the two sûras al-Falaq and al-Nâs (the mu’awwidhatâni) which are used as a protection against superstition and evil. Thus, it appears that the parrot had been taught to say: “Say: I seek refuge in the Lord of the dawn” and “Say: I seek refuge in the Lord of men.” Moreover, this parrot knew the names of most of the palace eunuchs.

<sup>63</sup> “He caused the jâmi’ al-Fakkâhîn (Mosque of the fruitsellers) to be built in the khaṭṭ al-shawwâyin in al-Qâhira”, thus according to al-Maqrîzî, Itti’âz III, 209.

15

One particularly dangerous aspect of the Imâm's activities was his penchant for involving himself directly in the careers of his Viziers. He seemed unable to prevent himself from meddling and frequently tried to cause his Viziers to be murdered by a third party.

We know of one earlier occasion when this had succeeded; the Imâm had encouraged the son of 'Abbâs to murder Ibn al-Salâr while he was having his afternoon sleep. [In taking an afternoon sleep, he resembled 'Alî, the son-in-law of Mohammad.]

Now it was the turn of the next Vizier, the Rabîb 'Abbâs. For this trifling task the Imâm had to appeal once again to Naşr's killer instincts. But on this occasion it was of course Naşr's own father whose life was at stake.

Incidentally, at precisely this time, the aspiring murderer was commissioned by his father 'Abbâs to take care of the Imâm's well-being. In other words, Naşr, as son of the Vizier, had been given the task by the secular authorities [Rabîb 'Abbâs] of devoting himself to the special duty of guarding the Imâm. This situation would have ominous consequences, especially for Naşr's father 'Abbâs.

16

We find another view of this situation in the History of the Patriarchs<sup>64</sup>:

"Nâşir al-Dîn ibn 'Abbâs established a friendly relationship with the Imâm al-Zâfir (wa-kâna Nâşir al-Dîn ibn 'Abbâs qad şara lahu khalṭa bi l-imâmi l-Zâfir). He once came and visited him in his palace at night in order to eat and drink and spend the night until the breaking of the dawn.

"The Caliph wished to go out with him in the night to his [i.e. Naşr's] house in the alley of the Sword-makers in order to sit with him for a part of the night and listen to songs. Then he took his leave when he had accompanied him inside his own palace once again.

"This was heavy to bear for 'Abbâs because he feared that his son would kill him just as he (the son) had killed 'Alî ibn al-Salâr.

"The one with whom he was associated tells us that 'Abbâs the father of Naşr al-Dawla received a report that the Caliph had said to Naşr: 'kill your own father and then you shall be the vizier for you are more beautifully suited to that function than your father (uqtul abûka wa-kun anta al-wazîr fa'innaka ajmal min abûka lahâ)'.

usquf al-Ashmûnîn, ed. A. Khater and O.H.E. Khs.-Burmester, Cairo 1968, vol. III, part I, p. 44-45 (Arabic text).

“Thereupon ‘Abbâs thought of a plan in order to stay alive (al-ḥîla fî l-salâma). But in that plan there was ruin and perdition, namely in the fact that he exhorted Naṣr al-Dawla to kill the Caliph by saying to him the following:

“The people have cheapened your reputation; and among them there is an ugly tale because of that which they have heard about your social intercourse with al-Zâfir (anna l-nâs qad istabâhû ‘irdaka wa-ṣâra lahum fîka ḥadîth qabîḥ bimâ sami‘ûhu min khalṭatika bi l-Zâfir).

In what manner will be your defence against what they say?”

“And his father ‘Abbâs was laughing (while saying that) but Naṣr al-Dawla said to him: ‘You laugh but I am afraid for you, for you will not laugh again.’

“Thereupon, on the basis of this, the father surmised that he (Naṣr) planned to kill him. But he did not guess what sort of disaster he (himself) would cause towards the Caliph.

“When it was the night of that day he (Naṣr) entered the palace of the Caliph as was his custom. He sat for an hour with him and then asked him to accompany him, appearing to the common people (‘awâmm) in disguise.

“Thus he went out with him through the Portal (Bâb al-Zuhûma) and they stopped walking for a while in the shop which was opposite that portal, belonging to the maker of fruitbeer. With him they drank fuqâ‘ and after that they walked on.

“Then he asked the Imâm to accompany him to his home (dâr) which was in the lane of the Sword-makers (Suyûfiyyîn), to sit for an hour and then return.

“He accompanied him again. The Caliph was disguised in a wide burda (cloak) in which he had wrapped himself. With him were two eunuchs (ustâdh-s). Then he finally arrived and sat with him in his Salon sitting in his company for an hour.

“After that he [Naṣr] ordered someone from among his own friends to strangle him with his own mandîl until he died.”

The word mandîl can mean scarf or turban.<sup>65</sup> Either way, it would have been a long band of cloth.

“Then he (Naṣr) also killed the two eunuchs (ustâdh-s). He threw him (the Caliph) in the well with the two eunuchs on top of him. Then he filled in the shaft and he put a slab of stone upon it so that the hole could not be rediscovered.

“This happened on 29 Muḥarram in the year 549. He concealed the matter from the people but Allah made it public and took revenge for the sake of the murdered ones, because of the fact that he (Naṣr) had walked to his father and informed him of what he had done.

“Thereupon the father was afraid that the masses of the common people (‘awâmm) would rebel against him and would remove him from the Kingdom (mulk). Because of this, he rode to the palace in the early morning and summoned the Zimâm al-Qaṣr. He besought him to obtain leave of entry for him.

<sup>65</sup> See al-Maqrîzî, Itti‘âz III, 148, where it is stated that in 527 H in the time of the Fatimid Imâm al-Ḥâfîz someone was arrested and found to be in the possession of 360 gold-embroidered mandîl-s with matching mantles worked with gold: “for each day this person had another mantle and a mandîl” and the historian adds by way of explanation: “this is a turban (‘amâma); each hanging on a silver peg.”

“But neither the Zimâm al-Qaṣr nor anyone else had any knowledge of the excursion of the Caliph, nor about what had befallen him. So he went inside to search for him but did not find him.

“Then ‘Abbâs took hold of the Zimâm al-Qaṣr and asked him for information about him (the Imâm). With many oaths the majordomo swore that he did not know where he was.

Then ‘Abbâs said to him: ‘Fetch me his brothers; I am afraid lest they be the ones who killed him.’

“Then he went inside the palace and brought the brothers, Yûsuf and Jabrîl, to him with Ṣâliḥ the son of Ḥasan; the latter had once been his brother. [Ḥasan masmûm, the Poisoned One, who had been poisoned some years earlier on the orders of his father the Imâm al-Ḥâfiẓ.]

“Then he enquired of them and complained to them that they were (indeed) the ones who had killed him (the Caliph). He commanded his soldiers to kill them, whereupon they killed them and they also killed the Zimâm al-Qaṣr.

“He plundered the royal apartments of the King (i.e. the Imâm) by the hand of his ruffians. And he killed all of them (i.e. the brothers and the nephew) in the hall of the Golden Portal (Bâb al-Dhahab).

“Then he took the son of the Caliph, who was a little child whose name was ‘Isâ. Then he caused him to sit on the throne as Caliph on the last day of Muḥarram in the year of the moon 549 (hilâliyya). They gave him the honorific title (na‘t) al-Imâm al-Fâ‘iz (i.e. The Victorious One).”<sup>66</sup>

17

The events which led to the murder of the Imâm and several members of his family by ‘Abbâs and his bloodthirsty son Naṣr are described in detail by al-Maqrîzî.

In Maqrîzî’s Itti‘âẓ we find a wealth of information concerning the situation after the murder of Ibn al-Salâr, especially as to the manner in which the Imâm al-Ẓâfir cajoled Naṣr into murdering his own father, which is described in great detail. We even find an accessory moving between the Imâm and the murderer-to-be.

“When ‘Abbâs arrived in al-Qâhira, Ẓâfir vested him with the mantle of honour of the Vizier on the previously-mentioned Friday. He received the honorary title (na‘t) al-Afḍal Rukn al-Islâm (The Most Excellent Pillar of Islam). [The title al-Afḍal was in general use and had also been given to several Viziers in past time.]

“He set to work and made himself master of the affairs. He gave generously to the Amîrs and treated the soldiers (al-ajnâd) well, so that they might forget the murder of al-‘Âdil [i.e. ‘Alî Ibn al-Salâr].

<sup>66</sup> My translation, see also History of the Patriarchs of the Egyptian Church Known as the History of the Holy Church by Sawîrus ibn al-Muqaffa’ vol. III, part I, p. 44-46 (Arabic text) and p. 76 (English translation).

“His son Naşr continued to guard the Caliph: he was so occupied by him that he had no attention for anyone else. This did not please his father.

“The Caliph al-Zâfir did not cease to grant very large presents to Naşr [the descendant of Tamîm]. He sent him on a certain day 20 dishes of silver on which were 20,000 dînârs. After that, he did not pay any more attention to him for several days.

“Then he was given an ornamental cloth (kiswa) of each kind. After that, he did not pay any more attention to him for several days.

“Then he was given 50 dishes of silver on which were 50,000 dînârs. After that, he did not pay any more attention to him for several days.

“Then he was given 30 saddled mules and also 40 camels with full equipment of jute nosebags for eating, and reins (... wa-arba'in jamalan bi-'udadihâ wa-gharâ'irihâ wa-hibâlihâ).

“Between them both, a certain Murtafi' ibn Faḥl went hither and thither with regard to the murder to be undertaken by Naşr against his father 'Abbâs, just as he had done to al-Âdil Ibn al-Salâr, the husband of his grandmother (Bullâra) a short while before.

“All this reached his father via the tongue of Usâma ibn Munqidh; and so he (the father) tried to be friendly towards him (Naşr); and he tried to induce him to be sympathetic towards himself.

“This affair proceeded from bad to worse to such an extent that the Caliph left his palace to go to the residence (dâr) of Naşr ibn 'Abbâs. (...)

“Then 'Abbâs became afraid of the audacious rashness of his son, fearing that he would exhort the Caliph so that the latter would permit him (Naşr) to murder him himself. Then he (Naşr) would kill him just as he (Naşr) had killed Ibn al-Salâr.

“Thereupon 'Abbâs reprimanded him (? Murtafi') in secret and forbade him to serve the Caliph and his son Naşr; but his words were of no use to Murtafi' (fa-'atabahu sirran wa-nahâhu 'an mulâzamatî l-khalîfa wa-bnihi fa-lam yufid fîhi l-qawlu).”<sup>67</sup>

In his Annals sub anno 549 H, al-Maqrîzî tells us the following:

“In that year al-Zâfir [the Imâm] summoned Nâşir al-Dawla Naşr ibn 'Abbâs. Subsequently he caused to be fetched for him a golden dish on which lay one thousand precious jewels, varying between pearls, and red and yellow yâqût, and yellow and green emerald (zumurrud dhubâbî).”<sup>68</sup>

The last-mentioned stone, the dhubâbî was of a value unheard of before.

[Indeed, “its beauty is enhanced by the immensity of its volume and the lines of its layering. It is vivid green, of a green colour not mixed with other colour, of a pleasing watery hue, blazing in its brilliance. It was called dhubâbî because its colour was like the colour of the big green flies (in the spring). In fact in a bright light it is the most beautiful kind of green. This jewel is rarer than the rarest—or no, it hardly exists at all.”].<sup>69</sup>

“What is more, al-Zâfir ordered for him from the ministry of Finance [bayt al-mâl] a sum of ten thousand Egyptian dînârs.

“But after this, six days after this gift, Naşr killed him.”

In al-Dawâdârî, we find a report in the same vein, albeit much shorter.<sup>70</sup>

18

It is clear that al-Zâfir’s plans totally misfired. He had consistently tried to rid himself of any Vizier whom he did not like by arranging for him to be eliminated. On one occasion he had been successful, when Ibn al-Salâr had been murdered in his bed. The murderer on that occasion who had made all the arrangements with a crowd of “drinking companions”—or rather, the special guard of the Caliph—was none other than Naşr, the son of Ibn al-Salâr’s Rabîb.

Now Naşr had to be incited to murder once again. The Imâm tried to put pressure on Naşr by giving him costly presents and thus putting him in a position of obligation towards him.

Naşr did indeed perform a second murder, but his father ‘Abbâs was able to deflect his son’s destructive energy and turn it upon the Imâm himself. This unexpected result was in part due to the intrigues of Usâma ibn Munqidh the aforementioned friend and companion of the Rabîb. It is from Usâma that the Rabîb is alleged to have heard about the unusual activities of his son.

The sources are clear in their elucidation of events—so clear that it seems there must always have been someone else present during the secret and dangerous conversations, and the plan-making sessions between father and son.

Certain remarks played a crucial role in turning around the intentions of Naşr as he embarked upon the murder of his father. And these same remarks were the cause of the murderous attack upon the Imâm.

Usâma is alleged to have held a small conversation with ‘Abbâs:

“How can you tolerate what the people are saying about the reputation of your son? And that they suspect the Caliph of doing to him what is done to women?”

“‘Abbâs took offence at this and he reprimanded his son, but the latter did not heed his reprimand. Then however al-Zâfir gave to Naşr as a present the estate (nâhiyat) of Qalyûb. And after that, Naşr came to his father and informed him about it.

“Then Usâma [who again happened to be present] said the following to Naşr:

“As a bridal gift for you, that present is not so very expensive (mâ hiya bi-mahrika ghâliya).”

<sup>70</sup> See al-Dawâdârî, Kanz VI, p. 557ff.

‘Abbâs was angered by this and he said to Usâma the following:

“What way out is there to be invented, in order to escape from that by which we are put to trial?”

“Usâma answered: ‘That is easy, for this Caliph comes to your son in his house every time in secret. Command him then to murder him when he comes.’

“‘Abbâs invited his son into his presence and said: ‘My dear Son, you have given much company to the Caliph. The people are speaking ill of you with words which cause pain to my heart. Perhaps this will come to the ears of our enemies which will result in something which will not be stopped.’

“Thereupon Naşr became very angry and said the following: ‘Would killing perhaps make you content?’”

“‘Abbâs answered: ‘For the sake of your good reputation, make an end to these suspicions in whatever way you wish.’”<sup>71</sup>

19

As a result of these conversations at the palace of the Vizier, the palace of the Imâm and the residence of his son Naşr who resided in one wing of the Vizier’s palace, things developed which show a high measure of hypocrisy. Intrigues were unceasingly woven with the result that not only did the Imâm become the victim of a murder plot, but two of his brothers and one of his nephews also came to be murdered, as it were en passant.

There is much more to be said about this. We have the hindsight of the anti-Shî‘ite al-Dawâdârî in Kanz al-Durar<sup>72</sup>:

“Mentioning of the Caliphate of al-Zâfir ibn al-Ḥâfiẓ and a résumé of his biography. He is Abu l-Manşûr Ismâ‘îl ibn Abi l-Maymûn ‘Abd al-Majîd al-Ḥâfiẓ and the rest of his genealogy (nasab) has already been mentioned. His mother was an umm walad, whose name was Sitt al-Wafâ’. He was born in the month of al-Muḥarram in the year 527 H. He was inaugurated (bay‘a) on Sunday 5 Jumâdâ II of that year [543 H]. On that day he was 17 years and 5 months.

“His Caliphate lasted 4 years and 8 months.

“His Regent [mudabbir dawla, the organiser of the State] was ‘Abbâs al-Muẓaffar, and Naşr who was the son of the former’s wife.

“His Chancellor (kâtib) was al-Shaykh al-Muwaffaq.

“He took pleasure in loving Naşr, the son of the wife of ‘Abbâs al-Muẓaffar, and so he had no patience when this man was absent, neither by night nor by day.

<sup>72</sup> Al-Dawâdârî, Kanz al-durar VI, ed. Şalâḥ al-Dîn al-Munajjid, Cairo Wiesbaden 1961, p. 557ff. Also see ‘Umâra’s Elegies and the Lamp of Loyalty, Anlsl 34 (2000), p. 470, note 9.

“He paid him money and granted him benefactions, which is impossible to count. So much it was! Included in this total is what has been mentioned by Shaykh Shams al-Dîn Ibn Khallikân—may God have mercy upon him—in his History (Târikh), namely that he entered into his presence on the day of al-‘adas (the lentils). Thereupon he presented him with Qalyûb, with all sorts of stock, and various lands for market gardening, and also the ground rent kharâj from them.

“And he said: ‘This is Thursday’s present but it is too little in comparison to what you are entitled, oh Naşr!’

“The love increased so much that horrible things were heard about them both. And al-Zâfir customarily used to say at the council meetings—and in private—‘‘Abbâs and Naşr belong to the Ahl al-Bayt (the people of the household).’

“He meant that they belonged to the innermost circle i.e. the women and children. But he [the Imâm] took it as an offence if by that it was meant that they belonged in reality to the Clan of the Prophet, so much so that the Devil played with the reason of both of them.

“Thereafter they killed him, according to what will be mentioned in its own year.”<sup>73</sup>

The historian al-Dawâdârî connects the evil reasoning of the plotters (father and son) and the third person (the intriguer Usâma) with the double entendre implied by the “Ahl al-Bayt” in this instance. However we ought to remember that al-Dawâdârî was Sunnî and—apparently—extremely anti-Shî‘a. In the Kanz we hear more about the plot as al-Dawâdârî informs us of his own particular view of events.

“In the year 9, al-Zâfir, Caliph of Egypt is murdered. That happened when the Devil played with the minds of ‘Abbâs and of Naşr, both of whom have already been mentioned. He painted for them a pretty picture which would have far-reaching consequences.

“‘Abbâs was alone with Naşr, the son of his wife and said to him: ‘You know what is being said and what is fixed in the minds of the people about our business, and that we are the [only] ones who belong to the Ahl al-Bayt. The best idea is that we should act craftily in the assassination of this Caliph for his comprehension, opinion and counsel are juvenile. And we should possess this Caliphate. For only through ambitions can things be made to happen (wa-innamâ l-ashyâ‘u himam).’

“Naşr answered this in a positive way and both of them were in agreement. Therefore he made an effort to compose an elevated invitation (fa-htamma fî ‘amali da‘wa sanîya). Then he asked for admittance to al-Zâfir; and he asked him to come in secret to his own house without anyone knowing.

<sup>73</sup> According to al-Dawâdârî, Kanz al-durar VI, 557-558: “wa-kâna l-Zâfir yaqûlu dâ‘iban fî l-mala’ wa l-khalâ: ‘Abbâs wa-Naşr min ahli l-bayt wa-huwa ya‘nî ‘ani l-taqarrubi, fa-shana‘a ‘anhu annahu min ahli l-bayt haqqan hattâ la‘iba l-shaytânû bi-‘uqûlihîmâ fa-qatalâhu.”

“The latter agreed, overcome by love and the dawning of the moment of Death. (...)

“When al-Zâfir arrived disguised beneath the trailing seams of the night, ‘Abbâs came outside to meet him with a drawn sword in his hand and said: ‘Woe to you, oh Caliph who accepts the orders of boys.’

“After that, he grabbed hold of him and cut his throat and buried him in the air shaft (bâdhhanj) in the Dâr al-Ma’mûnî (in the Lane of the Sword-makers, al-Suyûfiyyîn).

“After that, ‘Abbâs immediately rode quickly towards the Palace and said: ‘Ask admittance for me to al-Zâfir our Master regarding an important matter.’

“The eunuchs (ustâdhûna) and the chamberlains (hujjâb) sought al-Zâfir but did not find him. Then al-‘Abbâs said: ‘Fetch the sons of al-Ḥâfîz for me.’—and there were Abu l-Amâna Jabrîl and Abu l-Ḥajjâj Yûsuf. Then he commanded that they both should be killed by the sword.

“A large group of them were killed, among whom was Abu l-Tuqâ Ṣâliḥ son of Ḥasan, and the Zimâm al-Qaṣr (the majordomo) together with a group of people whose wickedness he feared, namely the notables of the Dawla and the leaders of the Kingdom.<sup>74</sup>

“Thereafter he summoned the qâḍî l-quḍâh (the chief Qâḍî) and the other qâḍî-s. On that day these were Yûnus al-Itfîḥî and the qâḍî Mujallî the author of the book al-Dhakhâ’ir. He inaugurated (gave the bay’a to) al-Fâ’iz as will be mentioned later.

“The murder of al-Zâfir was on the night of the Thursday at the end of Muḥarram of this year.

“His (al-Zâfir’s) Caliphate was 4 years and 8 months. The judges (qâḍî-s) of al-Zâfir Billâh were the following persons: Abu l-Faḍâ’il Yûnus al-Itfîḥî and the faqîh Mujallî Abu l-Ma’âlî ibn Jumay’ Ibn Najâ al-Makhzûmî.

“He assumed the Caliphate when he was 17 years and 5 months old, and he was murdered when he was 22. And Allah knows best.”<sup>75</sup>

20

What is interesting for us as readers is that the ahl al-bayt—in the sense of the people of the palace, the ahl al-qaṣr—did not wish to acquiesce to the grievous situation which was to be unleashed by these murders. In fact, they despatched letters calling for assistance.

At this point in time the Governor Ṭalâ’î ibn Ruzzîk and his clan were living in the South of Egypt, which was Ṭalâ’î’s own province. They received letters and sentimental poems composed by al-Qâḍî al-Jalîs who was tutor to the children (jalîs) of the Imâm, but also employed as a dignitary in the Chancellery of the Imâm. This implies that he was a responsible functionary. In the letters, the women of the palace had enclosed the severed locks of their own hair in order to give emphasis to their state of mourning and lamentation.

In the poetry itself we read something of the mood prevailing at court. At the same time we are fortunate to have a view of the situation seen from a contemporary angle in another fragment of poetry written with hindsight by the same person, Qâḍî Jalîs. The person destined to receive all this must have been none other than the Governor Ṭalâ'i himself.

Speaking of 'Abbâs and his son, the Qâḍî says<sup>76</sup>:

أَصَادُفُهُمْ قَوْلًا وَغَيْبًا وَمَشْهَدًا      نَحْوَهُمْ عَلَى عَمْدٍ بِفَعْلٍ أَعَادِي
ب فَايْنُ بَنُو رَزِيكَ عَنْهَا وَنَصْرُهُمْ      وَمَالَهُمْ مِنْ مَنَعَةٍ وَذِيَادِ
ج فَلَوْ عَايَنْتَ عَيْنَاكَ بِالْقَصْرِ يَوْمَهُمْ      وَمَصْرَعَهُمْ لَمْ تَكْتَحِلْ بِرُقَادِ
د فَمَزَّقْ جَمُوعَ الْمَارِقِينَ فَإِنَّهَا      بِقَايَا زُرُوعٍ آدَنْتَ بِحَصَادِ

- a I encounter them as enemies (of the Fâtîmids) in intention and in deed whenever they speak (ill), whether they (the Fâtîmids) are present or absent.
- b Where then are the Banû Ruzzîk? So far from here with their support and with what they have of safety and defence.
- c Suppose Your eyes had seen their fateful day and their destruction in the palace, then those eyes would not have been anointed with the kohl of sleep.
- d Tear apart the crowds of rebels, for they are but straggling seedlings who announce their readiness for plucking.

20.1

Another fragment exists by the same poet which is as it were a second draft for the description of these events.<sup>77</sup>

20.2

In a view which must have been composed with hindsight by the same tutor and chancellor, we find mentioned the courage and benefaction of Ṭalâ'i' in the midst of his own clan, the Banû Ruzzîk. At the same time it appears from the wording of line 6 that certain of the Amîrs had less courage than Ṭalâ'i' and would have been willing to accept the fact that the Imâm was going to be murdered. They felt powerless and would have preferred to acquiesce in the awful situation caused by the horrible murders perpetrated upon the Imâm and his brothers.

This appears in the fragment to rhyme râ'imû<sup>79</sup> where we hear the Chancellor al-Jalîs saying the following:

١	ولما تَرَامَى الْبَرْبَرِي بِجَهْلِهِ	إِلَى فَتْكَةٍ مَا رَامَهَا قَطُّ رَائِمٌ
٢	رَكِبْتَ إِلَيْهِ مَتْنٌ عَزَمَتِكَ الَّتِي	بَأَمْثَالِهَا تُلْقَى الْخُطُوبُ الْعِظَائِمُ
٣	وَقُدَّتْ لَهُ الْجُرْدُ الْخِفَافُ كَأَنَّمَا	قَوَائِمُهَا عِنْدَ الطَّرَادِ قَوَادِمُ
٤	وَتَنَصَّلُ مِنْهَا وَالْعَجَاجُ خَضَابُهَا	هُوَادٍ لِأَرْكَانِ الْبِلَادِ هَوَادِمُ
٥	تَجَافَتْ عَنِ الْمَاءِ الْقَرَّاحِ فَرِيئُهَا	دِمَاءُ الْعِدَا فَهِيَ الصَّوَادِي الصَّوَادِمُ
٦	وَقَمْتَ بِحَقِّ الطَّالِبِيِّينَ طَالِبًا	وَعَيْرُكَ يُغْضِي دُونَهُ وَيُسَالِمُ
٧	أَعَدْتَ إِلَيْهِمْ مُلْكَهُمْ بَعْدَ مَا لَوْ	بِهِ غَاصِبٌ حَقُّ الْأَمَانَةِ ظَالِمُ
٨	فَمَا غَالِبٌ إِلَّا بِنَصْرِكَ غَالِبٌ	وَمَا هَاشِمٌ إِلَّا بِسَيْفِكَ هَاشِمُ
٩	فَأَدْرِكُ بَثَارَ الدِّينِ مِنْهُ وَلَمْ تَزَلْ	عَنِ الْحَقِّ بِالْبَيْضِ الرِّقَاقِ تُخَاصِمُ

- 1 When the Berber [the Rabîb 'Abbâs], in his ignorance, involved himself in a murder, something which no ambitious person had ever aspired to until then,
- 2 You rode to him on the back of Your decision, which is so effective that enormous disasters shall be confronted.
- 3 You have spurred on the short-haired horses as if their pursuing legs were wings.
- 4 From them the foremost horses break loose, whilst the thrown-up dust colours them, destroyers of the foundation stones of the regions.
- 5 They avoided the pure water for their drinking consisted of the blood of their enemies; they were thirsty and tenacious.
- 6 You set up the Rights due to the Tâlibî family; others than you shut their eyes and tried to resign themselves to him ('Abbâs), however to
- 7 them you have returned their Kingdom, after an unjust usurper had turned away what was entrusted.
- 8 There is no conqueror other than he who conquers with your support; there is no Hâshim [an ancestor of Mohammad] other than he who destroys (hâshim) by your sword.
- 9 Thus shall the vengeance of Religion catch up with him; for in defence of the (Shî'ite) truth you will not cease your opposition with razor-sharp swords.

<sup>79</sup> In this poetical reflection (to rhyme râ'imû) on the misdeeds of 'Abbâs and his son Naṣr, which is addressed to Ṭalā'î, we can hear the words of the Palace Chancellor al-Qāḍî al-Jalîs. He emphasises the fact that the evil Vizier 'Abbâs is not descended from any Arabic line.

21

The image of the Vizierate presented here as it is taken away from the Rabīb and his murderous son, and the action of the Governor coming from the South, may perhaps seem surprising to us. Moreover Ṭalā'i' ibn Ruzzīk will become the new Vizier. The next fragment of poetry was written by someone anonymous; possibly it is by Ṭalā'i' himself, or by a chancellor at the time when the new Vizier from the Banū Ruzzīk had been confirmed in his appointment by the child Imām al-Fā'iz.

The anonymous author even personifies the Vizierate for us as a very beautiful woman who first marries into a relationship which is beneath her, and then after being repudiated by her husband, takes a better man in marriage at the end of her month of impurity.

In other words, she has a divorce behind her just as the Vizierate has a divorce behind it (i.e. 'Abbās has been got rid of) and there is now room for a better husband, i.e. Ṭalā'i'.

In the Kharīdat Miṣr, 'Imād refers to Ṭalā'i' in the following way:

"I, 'Imād, saw a fragment of his own words in the preface to the bundle of his poems, namely in the Khuṭbat al-Dīwān by al-Ṣāliḥ ibn Ruzzīk [Ṭalā'i'] as follows.

"He is a Vizier who is adequate, and he is the Vizier who is Regent, and the King through whose reputation army lines are confounded, through whose name armies are defeated. He is the One who has revived the remains of the kingdom; for those remains had almost disappeared through being wiped away.

"Through him their sheen and their light have returned once more."<sup>80</sup>

In the Rawḍatayn and in the Kharīdat Miṣr, al-Jalīs makes an allusion to the poet Surrdurr in his Dīwān and to a passage from a qaṣīda where Surrdurr praises the Vizier of the Caliph in Baghdad, namely Fakhr al-Dawla Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b Muḥammad b Jahīr, and congratulates this Fakhr upon his return to the Vizierate.<sup>81</sup>

In the lines of verse by al-Jalīs we read:

[to rhyme kafūruhā]

فأظْهَرُهَا حَتَّى أَقَرَّ كَفُورُهَا	١ وقد خَفِيَتْ مِنْ قَبْلِهِ مُعْجَزَاتُهَا
وَمَا كَانَ يُرْجَى بَعْثُهَا وَنُشُورُهَا	٢ أَعَدْتُ إِلَى جِسْمِ الْوِزَارَةِ رَوْحَهَا
فَهَذَا الْأَوَانُ قَرُورُهَا وَطُهورُهَا	٣ أَقَامْتُ زَمَانًا عِنْدَ غَيْرِكَ طَامِثًا

- 1 Already before his (Ṭalâ'i's) accession there were wondrous signs [i.e. of Fatimid Egypt] which had become concealed; but he made them manifest again and so confirmed for them again their (Ideal Regent) Kafûr.
- 2 You [Ṭalâ'i] have again transported the spirit into the body of the Vizierate although there had been no hope left for its resurgence and resurrection.
- 3 She [the Vizierate] remained for some time with another, all the time in menstruation. But now is the time for her menstruation to be purified.
- 4 It is right that the one who is entitled to her will be clothed in her and that the one who borrowed her will cast her off as a woman (mardûda).
- 5 When a beautiful woman (al-ḥasnâ) is possessed by someone who is not suitable for her, then her counsellor (mushîruhâ) gives an indication that he should divorce her.

In the Nuzhat al-muqlatayni we find the historian Ibn al-Ṭuwayr making subtle references to the hypocritical attitude of 'Abbâs the Rabîb when he went to the inauguration of the successor to the murdered al-Zâfir. We are told by several historians that this successor was a young child who was probably between two and five years old. His young age would make it easy for the Rabîb to reign as Vizier in the years to come, despite the various murders that he and his son had arranged in the meantime. In fact both the Vizier Ibn al-Salâr (died 548 H) and the Imâm al-Zâfir (died 549 H) had fallen victim to the Rabîb's murderous son Naṣr with the full compliance of his father.

The circumstances surrounding the inauguration of the child Imâm al-Fâ'iz 'Isâ ibn al-Zâfir were extremely shocking even for such an arch-intriguer as Usâma ibn Munqidh, who wrote a report about the event in his Kitâb al-I'tibâr (to be compared with Rawḍatayn I, 97-99, by Abû Shâma).

In Usâma's report we read the following:

"When Ibn al-Salâr had been killed by him [Naṣr] and when his father 'Abbâs had become Vizier, Naṣr was accustomed to enjoying the companionship with the Caliph al-Zâfir and he became involved with him.<sup>82</sup>

"But 'Abbâs had an abhorrence of this and was desolated (mustawḥish) with his son's involvement in this matter, because he knew about the inclinations of those people, and the intriguing by some people against other people in order to destroy them.

"Al-Zâfir began to incite the son of 'Abbâs against his own father, and began to show friendship towards him by means of many presents. Thereupon he [Naṣr] began to have conversations with me [Usâma] about that. But I discouraged him.

"Thereupon his father was informed of the affair. Then his father persuaded him and was friendly towards him and decided to kill al-Zâfir together with him."

According to this account there is a volte face: it is not the Imâm al-Zâfir but the Vizier 'Abbâs who takes the initiative to commit murder.

"They were both used to going out in disguise. They were of the same peer group; that is why they were the same age.

"Thereupon he (Naşr) invited him to his residence (dâr). He placed his usual companions at the side of the house. When the party was at its height, they suddenly appeared before him and murdered him. That was at the end of Muḥarram 549 H.

"They threw him with his two servants into a pit (jubb) inside the residence. Over this pit—now filled with people—a marble tile of a suitable color was placed so that this nicely matched with the interior. So the bodies remained in the house of the Rabîb, to be discovered later.

"The next day 'Abbâs came to the palace for the official audience. He sat down in the salon, waiting for the moment when al-Zâfir would hold his audience. But when the time for the audience had passed without anyone coming, 'Abbâs summoned the majordomo (zimâm al-qaşr) and said: 'Why is our master (mawlânâ) not holding the audience for the special greeting?'

"The Ustâdh hesitated with his answer. Thereupon 'Abbâs shouted at him and said: 'What prevents you from answering me?'

"He said: 'Oh my Master, as to our Master, we do not know where he is.'

"'Abbâs said: 'Would someone like our Master become lost? Go back and solve this matter.'

"Thereupon he went away; he returned later and said: 'We have not found our Master.'

"He ['Abbâs] said: 'Should people remain without a Caliph? Go inside to the brothers of our Master. Cause one of them to appear so that we may give him the inaugural oath.'<sup>83</sup>

"He went away; and he returned and said: 'The Masters [by which he meant the two brothers] say to you: 'We have nothing to do with the matter. Our father has kept him apart from us and positioned him in the topmost place. Thus the command should go to his child after his death.'

"He ['Abbâs] said: 'Let that child come outside so that we may give him the inaugural oath.'

"But 'Abbâs had already killed al-Zâfir and had decided to say to his brothers: 'You have killed him' in order to put an end to them.

"Thereafter the child al-Fâ'iz came forward. Perhaps his age at that time was five years. The eunuch (ustâdh) carried him. Thereupon 'Abbâs picked him up and also carried him. He ['Abbâs] was weeping all the time and the people wept with him.

"Then he accompanied him inside the salon of his father, still carrying him.

<sup>83</sup> This report is found with some variation also in Jamâl al-Dîn 'Alî Ibn Zâfir, Akḥbâr al-duwal al-munqaṭ'a, edition André Ferré, Ifao du Caire, 1972, p. 106.

“Inside were the sons of al-Ḥâfîz [i.e. the uncles and the nephew who had been murdered already].

“Ibn Munqidh also said: ‘Whilst we were in the Hall of Pillars and whilst there were more than one thousand Egyptians in the palace, we were not terrified by anyone except some people who came out of the salon in order to assemble in a group in the hall where we were.’

“And behold! the swords encountered a human being again and again. Thereupon I said to an Armenian servant (ghulâm) of mine: ‘Go and see who is being killed there!’

“He went into the palace and returned, saying: ‘Are they not then Muslims? This murdered man is our master (mawlânâ) Abu l-Amâna Jabrîl, the son of al-Ḥâfîz whom they have killed. Then there is yet another one whose belly is torn open. He is dragging himself along with his intestines.’

“After that, ‘Abbâs came outside, holding beneath his arm the head of the Amîr Yûsuf [the father of the future Imâm al-‘Âḍid], whilst there was visible upon the head a wound from the blow of a sword from which blood bubbled with much noise.

“And Abu l-Baqâ’ [Abû l-Tuqâ] the son of their brother (ibn akhîhim) was with his [‘Abbâs] son Naşr. After that, they brought the two of them inside the storeroom (khizâna) within the palace. Then they killed the two, whilst in that storeroom there were one thousand drawn swords. He [Usâma ibn Munqidh] said: ‘That day belonged to the worst of the days, which overwhelmed me because I saw so much of corruption and revolution that Allah, the Praised One, and all his creation would condemn it.’”<sup>84</sup>

23

Ibn al-Ṭuwayr expressively points to the call for revenge uttered by ‘Abbâs who, it should be remembered, was himself responsible for the murder of al-Zâfir. Regarding this situation, we see how Ibn al-Ṭuwayr makes use of it as he manages to insert a point in connection with a prayer to Allâh, which is fulfilled in a most unexpected manner.

“Al-Zâfir had a little son with the name ‘Isâ and his age was five years. They say that his age on that day was two years; and they say three years. The Vizier ‘Abbâs caused the majordomo (zimâm al-qaşr) to come to him and said: ‘Bring to me the child of our master,’

<sup>84</sup> Usâma ibn Munqidh, Kitâb al-I’tibâr, ed. Qâsim al-Sâmarra’î, Riyad 1987, p. 43-44; Memoirs of an Arab-Syrian Gentleman or An Arab Knight in the Crusades, Memoirs of Usâma ibn Munqidh, transl. Philip K. Hitti, (Princeton 1929) Beirut 1964, p. 45-47. In Ibn al-Qalânîsî, quoted by Abu l-Maḥâsin ibn Taghrî Bardî in al-Nujûm al-zâhira V, 291, however the matter is turned around completely. This historian (Ibn Q.) reports that two brothers and one nephew of al-Zâfir intended to kill, and indeed did so. But Ibn Taghrî Bardî al-Nujûm V, 292, quotes an ode by Chancellor Jalîs where the help of Ṭalâ’î’ as the most influential leader of the Ruzzîk clan is invoked. According to Ibn Taghrî Bardî al-Nujûm al-zâhira V, 296-297, this is proof of the inaccuracy of Ibn al-Qalânîsî.

“In the meantime he wept and showed sorrow. Then the eunuch came with the child of al-Zâfir, and subsequently ‘Abbâs took him from him, carried him upon his shoulder and kissed him, saying: ‘May Allâh kill the murderer of your father!’

“The historian remarks pointedly: ‘And his prayer was answered, both with regard to himself and to his own son, as we will relate if Allah the Most High wills it.’”<sup>85</sup>

24

After the Imâm al-Zâfir had been murdered and after his little son had been installed as Imâm by the Vizier ‘Abbâs and his clique of cronies, the people of the palace reacted by writing a letter requesting help from a governor in the south of Egypt.

Perhaps they had also called for help elsewhere. At any rate, they received a positive reaction from the governor just mentioned (Ṭalâ’i). In fact it was the Chancellor al-Qâḍî al-Jalîs who had written the letters.<sup>86</sup>

There was a happy ending, however. The Chancellor was not the only one in the circles around the palace, both near and far, who was to express his joy at the successful outcome of the help granted by Ṭalâ’i.

In this context there is another poet, al-Muhadhdhab, who must not remain unnoticed.<sup>87</sup> This poet, who is incidentally the same person who had earlier composed a laudatory poem in connection with the noble head of Ḥusayn when it arrived in al-Qâhira by boat from Ascalon, was a member of the direct circle around the palace. The incident with the head had occurred at a time when the Imâm al-Zâfir was still alive.

His full name is as follows: Abû Muḥammad, al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alî ibn Ibrâhîm ibn al-Zubayr, the Qâḍî al-Muhadhdhab. He died in Egypt in the month of Rabî’ II in the year 561 H. As a Chancellor and laudatory poet he occupied an influential position at the Vizierial court of Ṭalâ’i ibn Ruzzîk. He may well have been involved in creating poems on behalf of this Vizier since he was his (Muhadhdhab’s) mamdûḥ. These poems were subsequently included in the Divân of Ṭalâ’i.

Later on, during the two Vizierial reigns of Shâwar and the intervening one of Ḍirghâm, al-Muhadhdhab had already fallen into disgrace together with his brother the Qâḍî al-Rashîd ibn al-Zubayr who was executed in 562 or 563 H. The Qâḍî arrived at the court of Vizier Ṭalâ’i just after the murder of Imâm al-Zâfir and the succession to the throne of the child Imâm al-Fâ’iz. The Qâḍî started his career as a poet with the recitation of the following mournful verses:

١ ما للرياض تميل سكرًا      هل سقيت بالمزِنِ خمرا
٢ أفكربلاء بالعرَا      ق وكريلاء بمصر أخرى

“1 What then is amiss with the gardens, that they incline in a soporific glow? Have they then been drenched with wine because of the rainclouds?... and so on till the following line:

2 Does there exist one Karbalâ’ in ‘Irâq and another one in Egypt?

At this the eyes (at Court) were streaming and the palace reverberated with weeping and lamentation. Gifts rained upon him (the poet) from every side, coming both from the Amîrs and from the preachers (al-khuṭabâ). The Vizier caused a certain amount of money to be transported to his dwelling place.”

Thus, according to al-Ṣafadî, al-Wâfi bi l-wafayât, vol.7, ed. Ihsan Abbas, Stuttgart 1992, p. 222; and Abû ‘Abd Allâh Yâqût ibn ‘Abd Allâh al-Rûmî al-Ḥamawî, Mu’jam al-udabâ’ aw Irshâd al-arîb ilâ ma’rifat al-adîb, Beirut 1991, p. 517-526, No.124, sub voce Aḥmad ibn ‘Alî ibn Ibrâhîm ibn al-Zubayr al-Ghassânî.

In another manuscript we read the following:

“Gifts rained upon him from every side, coming both from the Amîrs and from the gentlewomen of the court (al-ḥazâyâ).”

Note the ḥazâyâ were specially favoured high-ranking women

Now al-Muhadhdhab ibn al-Zubayr has the chance to dedicate his later laudatory poem to someone who has risked his governorial position to help this dynasty of descendants from 'Alî, who descend from Fâtîma in the same way as the noble head.

In his laudatory poem dedicated to the Pious One, Şâlih Ṭalâ'i', al-Muhadhdhab inserts the name Şâlih not only in connection with this new Vizier, but also as an allusion to the Prophet Şâlih in the Koran, who arranged for a miracle to occur, when a camel came forth from a rock in order to convince the unbelievers. One must ask: was the Imâm like the Prophet Şâlih? Or was the Vizier like a camel? Unfortunately the questions must remain unanswered.

In the following poem in praise of Ṭalâ'i' ibn Ruzzîk, al-Muhadhdhab said:

(Poem to rhyme malaku composed by al-Muhadhdhab ibn al-Zubayr, as quoted by 'Imâd al-Dîn al-Işfahânî.<sup>88</sup> 'Imâd states that a certain Sharîf called Idrîs al-Ḥasanî had recited this fragment to him, informing him that it came originally from al-Muhadhdhab Ibn al-Zubayr himself, a poem in praise of Ibn Ruzzîk. Also in the Kharîda, we find 'Imâd commenting on the style of this poem.)

who lived at court. They were of impeccable moral standing, and not at all like the courtesans who graced the palaces of Europe. They were preferred in the same way as 'Ā'isha, the wife whom the Prophet favoured most.

The Zubayr clan had originally founded its power base in the city of Qûş in Upper Egypt, and that during the reign of the Fâtimid Imâm al-Ḥâfiẓ (reigned 524-544 H). F. Daftary and J.W. Meri, London 2003, p. 411-433.

‘Imâd says the following:

“The Sharîf Idrîs al-Ḥasanî recited in my presence a qaṣîda in praise of Ibn Ruzzâk, whilst he assured me that the poem was originally written by al-Muhadhdhab Ibn al-Zubayr. Its opening line is as follows:

- 1 Is this a Salon in the place of Glory or is it a sphere of heaven? Is it a king on the dais of the throne, or is it an angel?

Note the rhetorical question at the onset of this poem and compare this device with the start of some of the poems by ‘Umâra [see “‘Umara’s Elegies and the Lamp of Loyalty”, AnIsl 34 (2000) pp. 468-469].

The literary historian al-‘Imâd al-Kâtib said: “the following fragment belongs to this poem.”

- 2 Seeing the features of him (the Praised One) with one’s own eyes makes it superfluous for the onlookers to utter out loud that which has been made both beautiful and deceptive concerning a certain clan.
- 3 Oh Unique One of the Dahr! There is no contradiction of me and no correction when I utter my statement.
- 4 After the Amîr al-Mu’minîn’s death there has been no hero (fatâ) in whom there was courage and piety, except in you.
- 5 For the effect from him (the Imâm) and you today is harmonious; and the honorific title (na‘t) of him and you today is a shared possession.
- 6 He is called Şâlih, the prophet of the people of the religion, but you are Şâlih the Vizier of those who are taking hold of religion.
- 7 You were not content with the names of a clan of people who have become desiccated bones, as though their honorifics (alqâb) had become inheritance portions (turuk) in their wake.

Turuk singular tarîka, frequently means “inheritance portion” but the word has a second meaning: “ostrich eggshell” which is almost certainly implied here.

Referring to line 7, al-‘Imâd says: “The tawriya (double entendre) in this line is obvious.”<sup>89</sup>

However according to the present author, line 8 provides an explanation of the figure of style applied in line 7, which could better be defined as the istikhdâm, compare what Ibn Abi l-Iṣba‘ says when defining the difference between the style figures of tawriya and istikhdâm: tawriya depends on “the use of one of the meanings and the neglect of the other” while istikhdâm depends on “the use of two meanings together”.<sup>90</sup>

<sup>90</sup> See the discussion of both style figures by Ibn Abi l-Iṣba‘ in his books Taḥrîr al-taḥbîr and Badî‘ al-Qur’ân as described by

S.A. Bonebakker in Some Early Definitions of the Tawriya and Şafadî’s Faḍḍ al-Xitâm ‘an at-Tawriya wa l-Istikhdâm, The Hague-Paris 1966, p. 51.

Using the latter definition, the ambiguity in line 7 can be explained by taking the line in conjunction with line 8. In other words, turuk singular tarika, with the meaning ‘inheritance portion’ or ‘a woman who has been left behind as a widow after her husband had died, as though she were part of the inheritance’ in line 7 links with the idea of death implicit in “he destroyed them” in line 8; and turuk with the meaning ‘ostrich eggshells’ in line 7 links with the idea of resurrection implied by the words “he brought others to life again” in line 8. [Provided of course that we remind ourselves of the custom of burying the dead with broken eggshells inscribed with sacred writings, see Dionisius Agius, “Ostrich eggs in a burial site: Quṣeir al-Qadīm in the Ayyubid and Mamluk periods” This article is to be found in the OLA volume Egypt and Syria in the Fatimid, Ayyubid and Mamluk Eras IV, edited by U. Vermeulen and J. van Steenbergen, Leuven, presumably in 2003.]

The commentary on the above line 8 by ‘Imād al-Kātib in the Kharīdat Miṣr reads as follows:

“There is in this line neither praise nor reprimand; and the line has no part in praise nor in the giving of more details. For ‘just as he shows generosity through the act of giving life, so too does he show anger by destroying it.’ For by the destruction of the latter he has paid a ransom for the lives of the former. Suppose he had said: ‘He destroyed despicable people after they had lived in a comfortable way,’ then he would have satisfied the requirements of Art with a suitable creation. Then he would have offered the fruits of poetry upon the platter of the style figure of antithesis (taṭbīq).”

In the same poem we hear al-Muhadhdhab praising the timely support from the remote region in southern Egypt, where Ṭalāʾiʿ used to reside as Governor,

فَأَشْرَقَتْ بِكَمَا أَرْضُونَ وَالْفَلَكَ	٩ طَلَعْتَ وَالْبَدْرَ نِصْفَ الشَّهْرِ فِي قَرْنٍ
بِأَنَّ لَمَعَ السَّنَا فِي أَفْقِهِ ضَحِكَ	١٠ وَأَسْفَرَ الْجَوْ حَتَّى ظَنَّ مُبْصَرُهُ
يَكَاذُ مَنْ حَرَّهِ الْمَاضِي يُنْسَبُ	١١ يَقْوَدُ كُلَّ مُجِنٍّ ضِغْنٌ ذِي تِرَةٍ
رَاءٍ وَاسْتَرْجَعَ الْحَقُّ الَّذِي تَرَكُوا	١٢ حَتَّى أَعَادَ مَجْدُ السَّيْفِ مُلْكَ بَنِي الزَّهْرِ
فِي مَا مَضَى مَا غَدَتْ مَغْصُوبَةٌ فَدَكَ	١٣ فَلَوْ يَكُونُ لَهُمْ أَمْثَالُهُ عَضْدًا

- 9 You appeared with the full moon in the middle of the month, together in one yoke. Thereafter, all the lands of the world and the heavenly sphere were illuminated by the pair of you.
- 10 The air let a veil fall away, so whoever saw it surmised that the flashing of the lightning was a laugh on the far horizon.
- 11 To each person full of the hidden anger of revenge, he gave direction; through his heat honey almost melted.
- 12 The Glory of the sword brought back the Kingship of the sons of the Shining Lady (Banû l-Zahrâʾ i.e. the Fāṭimids); moreover the rights due to them which they had already surrendered were exacted for them again [the Shiʿa are called ahl al-ḥaqq, meaning ‘people of the rights due to them’.]
- 13 If in the past his mirror images had been a support to them, then Fadak would never have been taken by force.

At this point in the text 'Imâd al-Kâtib gives a comment in Kharîdat Miṣr: "In this prettily-composed wording he has said something utterly pointless; he has neglected the secret of the sharî'a in connection with Fadak; and he has given precedence in honour to the mamdûh (the Praised One) over the salaf (the Pious Forefathers). The hyperbole has brought him into error."

The editor also says: "he ('Imâd) refers to what has occurred as a result of the opinion of Abû Bakr and 'Umar, that Fâtima should not inherit Fadak because the Prophet had already given up his, and her, right to it, since he had said 'we, the group of the prophets, do not cause to be inherited that which we have already given as alms (ṣadaqa).'"<sup>91</sup>

In other words, the oasis had been given as alms and was not a possession of the Prophet to be given away as an inheritance.

"But the Shî'a were of the opinion that Abû Bakr and 'Umar had been wrong, and that there was nevertheless an obligation upon them to hand it over to Fâtima."

From a totally different corner of the Arab World, namely Mesopotamia and Syria, we are informed again by means of fragments of poetry about these particularly sorrowful occurrences. These fragments are moreover full of praise for Ṭalâ'i' who is seen as al-Malik al-Ṣâlih (the Pious King).

مَهَامُهُ تُنْضِي رُكْبَهَا وَسَمَالِقُ	٨ وَزَائِرَةٌ بَعْدَ الْهَدُوِّ وَبَيْنَنَا

8 After the calmness had returned, a lady came to visit though between us there were deserts and dry plains which emaciated the riders.

- 9 She was amazed by the greyness which she saw on the top of my head; is there then amazement because of someone whose head has grown grey?
- 10 While the strength of the embrace had crushed her silken gown and under it her breasts were sticking to her necklaces, she said:
- 11 'Do deceitful wishes make you inattentive towards us? I thought that even honest wishes would not distract you.'
- 12 When shall we meet each other outside of sleep? And will there be a complaint about someone for whom people long, while the one who longs is pitied because of the pain of parting?
- 13 Trust that I will return within a short time, for I trust that Ibn Ruzzîk will be bountiful within a short time.
- 14 He is the sea in which there are pearls and waves of benefaction; there are also flashes of lightning.
- 15 He is a brother of War, Lord of noble deeds, father of beneficent dew, ally of elevation, and a friend who is desirous of propriety (al-ʿurf).
- 16 Though he himself is far away, the rain showers are acquired from his sea. Though he is very tall, they approach the fruit of his branch.<sup>92</sup>

Another fragment also describes the unjust deeds which 'Abbâs perpetrated against the people of the Palace:

<sup>92</sup> From a poem to rhyme tufâriq, composed by the teacher and faqih Abu l-Faraj 'Abd Allâh ibn As'ad ibn 'Alî ibn 'Isâ ibn Dahhân al-Mawṣilî first, al-Ḥimṣî later. He came originally from the region of Mawṣil, but due to some problems he had to move towards another town, namely Ḥimṣ, where he earned his living as a teacher. Thereupon he travelled to Egypt in order there to compose poems of praise for both Nûr al-Dîn and Ṣalâh al-Dîn. See al-'Imâd al-Iṣfahânî al-Kâtib, Kharîdat al-qasr wa-jarîdat al-ʿaṣr qism shu'arâ' al-Shâm, ed. Shukrî Fayṣal, Damascus 1959, vol. II, 293-294; and Dîwân ibn al-Dahhân al-Mawṣilî Abu l-Faraj Muḥaddhab al-Dîn 'Abd Allâh ibn As'ad al-Mawṣilî al-Shâfi'î al-Ḥimṣî (died 581 H), ed. 'Abd Allâh al-Jabbûrî, Baghdad 1968, p. 226-229.

- 17 When 'Abbâs saw a way to treachery and showed what he had concealed through hypocrisy
18 and when he, having abandoned beneficence, expended money in order to destroy them, he himself was—by my life!—more suitable and more apt as compensation 19 And when he stretched out against them the hand which they had made long and powerful so that injustices descended upon the palace through his deeds 20 then they invoked you, whereupon you quickly answered that prayer. For them you brought salvation from their suffering when it was almost choking (them).
21 You reacted to their letters by army groups, of which the fastest hurried forward like racing clouds.
22 He [the Rabîb with his son] took flight in the hope that he would escape from the sharp edges of the swords; but a moment of death commanding the swords caught up with him.
23 He assumed that he had left death as a legacy behind him, but in front of him was death, fulfilling and suitable.
24 He let his master (al-Zâfir) drink from the beaker of death's destinies—but scarcely had a month passed him by than he tasted also from the same beaker.

26

We also possess a poem by someone from Aleppo, the then capital of northern Syria, from which a certain Qâḍî Thiqat al-Mulk Abû 'Alî al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alî ibn 'Abd Allâh Ibn Abî Jarâda travelled to Egypt to pursue his career.

But before turning to this poem itself, it is important to remember that Ibn Abî Jarâda alludes to an older work by an earlier poet, 'Amr ibn Ma'dîkarib al-Zubaydî. In the earlier poem to rhyme al-qiyâdi (which is also called the “primary” poem)<sup>93</sup>, 'Amr refers to an example of a one-sided feeling of serious animosity between an uncle and his nephew.

The later writer of the secondary poem, Ibn Abî Jarâda also makes use of this theme as he describes a situation involving serious conflict. The only way he can justify the fact that the position of one vizier is above that of another vizier is to ascribe it to a conflict between Ṭalâ'i' and 'Abbâs al-Ṣanhâjî and their subsequent fight to the death. The question was: who would deal the first blow?

In the eleventh line of the primary poem according to the 'Iqd al-farîd, we read:

أُرِيدُ حَيَاتَهُ وَيُرِيدُ قَتْلِي      عَذِيرُكَ مِنْ خَلِيلِكَ مِنْ مُرَادٍ

<sup>93</sup> See M.M. Badawi, “From primary to secondary qaṣida-s Thoughts on the Development of Classical Arabic Poetry” in Journal of Arabic Literature XI (Leiden 1980), p. 1-31.

- 11 I want him to stay alive, while he desires my death; who is pleading to your companion of [the tribe] Murâd on your behalf?

[i.e. the poet is 'Amr ibn Ma'dikarib al-Zubaydî, an uncle of Qays ibn Makshûh al-Murâdî, and is almost certainly describing his own situation.]<sup>94</sup>

There is another version of 'Amr's (primary) poem, however it is addressed to another personage, namely Ubayy al-Murâdî. The fifth line according to the Kitâb al-Aghânî, reads differently as follows.

أريدُ حِباءَهُ وَيُرِيدُ قَتْلِي عَذِيرَكَ مِنْ خَلِيلِكَ مِنْ مُرَادٍ

- 5 I want to offer him a gift, while he desires my death; ...<sup>95</sup>

Line 5 was said to have been recited by 'Alî ibn Abî Tâlib when he was standing face to face with his "companion" Abd al-Raḥmân ibn Muljam (by whom he was later to be killed). On this occasion Ibn Muljam had arrived in order to render his oath of loyalty to 'Alî and 'Alî was supposed to give him a present in return. However, 'Alî foreseeing his own death by the sword of Ibn Muljam, intended 'Amr ibn Ma'dikarib's line to be understood as a proverb and thus 'Alî gave evidence of his possession of prognostic knowledge:

I want to offer him a gift, while he desires my death; who is pleading to your companion of Murâd on your behalf?

[Incidentally according to the Maqâtil al-Tâlibiyyîn, Ibn Muljam also originated from the tribe of Murâd.]

After his quotation of 'Amr's line, 'Alî is said to have alluded to a Koranic text, Sura 91 verses 11-15:

"Thamûd counted (it) false in their presumption;

When their most miserable one (ashqâhâ) was sent,

And the messenger of Allah said to them: "The she-camel of Allah, and her drink!"

But they counted it false, and hamstrung her; so their Lord overwhelmed them for their sin and made it even,

Not fearing the consequence of it."<sup>96</sup>

<sup>94</sup> For the primary poem, the text is based on Ibn 'Abd Rabbih al-Andalusî, al-'Iqd al-farîd, edition Aḥmad Amin, Aḥmad al-Zayn and Ibrâhîm al-Abyârî, Cairo 1965, vol. I, 120-121. For the secondary poems, see for example Abû 'Alî Ismâ'îl ibn al-Qâsim al-Qâlî al-Baghdâdî, Kitâb al-Amâlî I, 14 (Cairo 1925, reprint Beyrut no date) and Abû 'Ubayd al-Bakrî, Kitâb al-Tanbîh 'alâ awḥâm Abî 'Alî fî amâlihi, p. 23-24; and al-Isâba fî tamyiz al-ṣaḥâba, sub voce "'Amr" and "Qays". Here is an allusion to a line by 'Amr ibn Ma'dikarib al-Zubaydî, the Companion of the Prophet, which describes his ibn ukht, a certain Qays ibn Makshûh al-Murâdî. They were deadly enemies, although they belonged to the same tribal conglomerate Madhhij. For 'Amr and Qays, see also W.M. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, Oxford 1956, p. 119-120 and 130.

<sup>95</sup> This second version of 'Amr's (primary) poem is based on Abû l-Faraj al-Isfahânî, Kitâb al-Aghânî (14, 34) second printing 15, 226-227.

<sup>96</sup> According to the translation by Richard Bell, The Qur'an Translated, with a Critical Rearrangement of the Surahs, Edinburgh (1937) 1960.

[This concerns Qudâr's killing of the she-camel and her young who had appeared so miraculously from a rock, at the time of the prophet Şâlih.]

In addition to this, 'Alî would have predicted his own death when being confronted by Ibn Muljam, referring at the same time to the killing of the she-camel in the following words:

"What is holding back their most miserable one (ashqâhâ)? By Him Who preserves my soul in His hand, this (she-camel) will certainly be slaughtered by this one." [I.e. Ibn Muljam.]<sup>97</sup>

26.1

In the secondary poem by Ibn Abî Jarâda there is the following reference to the person who will be the first to kill, when the poem begins enigmatically with the rhetorical question: "Who will be my guardian on the day that I visit a certain Murâd?"

مَنْ خَفِيرِي يَوْمَ أَرْتَادُ مُرَادِي	مَنْ عَذِيرِي مِنْ خَلِيلِي مِنْ مُرَاد
أَخَذْتُ بِالثَّأْرِ مِنْ بَاغٍ وَعَادٍ	حَامِلَ الْأَعْبَاءِ عَنْ أَهْلِ الْعَبَا
أَهْلُ نَصَبٍ وَنِفَاقٍ وَعِنَادٍ	مَنْ عَصَاةٍ أَضْمَرُوا الْغَدْرَ فِيهِمْ
لِبَنِي الْحَافِظِ بِالْبَيْضِ الْحِدَادِ	قَتَلُوا الظَّافِرَ ظُلْمًا وَانْتَحَوُا
فَوْقَ عُذْوَانٍ يَزِيدُ وَزِيَادِ	وَاعْتَدَى عَبَّاسٌ فِيهِمْ وَابْنُهُ
ثُمَّ ضَلُّوا مَا لَهُمْ مِنْ بَعْدِ هَادٍ	مِثْلَ سَفَرٍ قَتَلُوا هَادِيَهُمْ
فَتَوَلَّوْا مِثْلَ رَجُلٍ مِنْ جَرَادِ	جَاءَهُمْ فِي مِثْلِ رِيحٍ صَرَصَر
وَلَهَيْبِ الْجَمْرِ مِنْ تَحْتِ الرِّمَادِ	بَعْدَ مَا غَرَّهُمْ إِمْلَاؤُهُ
هَلْ تُرَاعُ الْأُسْدُ يَوْمًا بِالنِّقَادِ	وَتَظُنُّوا أَنْ سَتَرْتَعُ بِهِمْ

- 1 Who is pleading to my companion of Murâd on my behalf? Who then, will be my guardian on the day that I visit somebody of Murâd?
- 2 Oh you who lift up the loads which burden the People of the Mantle (ahl al-'abâ), and who take revenge upon the rebel and the fiend.
- 3 They are disobedient people harbouring treachery; they are a people of sickness, stubbornness and hypocrisy.
- 4 They have killed al-Zâfir unjustly; they have set themselves against the sons of al-Hâfiz with their sharp white swords.

rhyme al-qiyâdi can be found. Concerning Ibn Muljam's descentance from the Murâd tribe, see Abû l-Faraj al-Isfahânî, Maqâtil al-Ṭâlibiyyîn, edition al-Sayyid Aḥmad Şaqr, Beyrut no date, p. 31-32.

[The Imâm previous to al-Zâfir was his father ‘Abd al-Majîd al-Ĥâfîz]

- 5 ‘Abbâs went as an enemy against them with his son, more fiendish than the fiends Yazîd and Ziyâd.
- 6 Like travellers whose guide has been killed and who later wander lost and leaderless,
- 7 whom he (Ṭalâ’î) approached like a huge howling gust of wind and they fled from him like swarming locusts.
- 8 His tolerance led them astray; but glowing coals flamed forth from under the ashes, and afterwards
- 9 they supposed that you would fear them; but is there ever a day when lions are afraid of weakling sheep?<sup>98</sup>

At the centre of the group who organised the terrible murder in al-Qâhira were ‘Abbâs and his son Naṣr. Their actions did not go unnoticed in the wider Arab World; and indeed echoes of their deeds were to be heard as far away as Syria, as we saw earlier. Their victim, the Imâm al-Zâfir, was much mourned, as we shall soon learn.

27

In the poetry of the diplomat and poet ‘Umâra, we find allusions to the Rabîb ‘Abbâs. As ‘Umâra did not reach the courts of the Imâms and of the Viziers until after the death of the Imâm al-Zâfir, it is remarkable that he uses the name Zâfir as the name of the personage to whom his poem to rhyme jimâli<sup>99</sup> is addressed. But the cohesion of the Arabic text leads us to surmise that ‘Umâra intended to refer only to the meaning of the name Zâfir (the Victorious One) and not to the Imâm himself. If this is so, he may well have intended the name to refer to the Vizier Ṭalâ’î.

At the same time ‘Umâra does allude to the circumstances connected to the murdered Imâm in this poem to rhyme jimâli. In it we find a description of the removal of the Rabîb and his murdering son from their government functions in al-Qâhira.

The use of the name al-Zâfir to refer to a person other than the Imâm is in itself not particularly strange. An allusion of the same type appears to occur in the first line of the poem. In this case the name of an important Vizier from days gone by (Badr al-Jamâlî)

<sup>98</sup> This particular secondary poem to rhyme murâdî is quoted by al-‘Imâd al-İṣfahânî, who (in 571 H) had heard it recited to him by the Sharîf Idrîs ibn al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alî ibn Yahyâ al-Ḥasanî al-İdrîsî al-Miṣrî. This poem had been composed by the Qâḍî Thiḡat al-Mulk Abû ‘Alî al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alî ibn ‘Abd Allah ibn Abî Jarâda who died in the month of Jumâdâ First, year 551 H in Egypt. In this poem there is praise for al-Şâliḡ ibn Ruzzîk and a description of all he did to support the people of the Palace. See al-‘Imâd al-İṣfahânî, Kharîdat al-qaṣr, qism shu‘arâ’ al-Shâm II, Damascus 1959, 197-200.

<sup>99</sup> The edition Derenbourg, Nukat-Diwan [= Hartwig Derenbourg, ‘Oumâra du Yémen sa vie et son œuvre, vol. I (Autobiographie et récits sur les vizirs d’Égypte. Choix de poésies: fiḡhi al-Nukat al-‘aṣriyya fi akhbâri l-wuzarâ’i l-Miṣriyya Paris 1897)] does not contain the poem to rhyme jimâli. Ms. D, on which this edition is largely based, does not contain this poem either. However, the poem does appear in Ms. Rabat, p. 171-173! The poem to rhyme ḡanînu jimâli consists of 52 lines. The following lines of prose form an introduction, Ms. Rabat: “In honour of al-Zâfir and his Vizier al-Şâliḡ, he also said the following:...” See also Anlsl 35 (2001), p. 617-619.

could be intended in line 1, whilst in line 23 it seems that the name Zâfir is casually dropped as 'Umâra speaks about the punishment of the dastardly 'Abbâs and his even more dastardly son Naşr.

Ms. Rabat: In honour of al-Zâfir and his Vizier al-Şâliḥ, he also said the following:

- 1 Is it a heaven determined by fate or a heaven of majesty? And the glow of a full moon or the desires of camels? (... wa-ḍiyâ'u badrin am ḥanînu jimâli)
- 2 Is it the establishment of a kingdom or the foundation of Compassion, from which the Revelation was watered by rain clouds from Shawwâl?

23 The Victorious One [al-Zâfir] has so much honour that no other person from a bygone age could boast of such honour.

24 He is the Pious One of the Monarchy (al-şâliḥ al-mulki) who supports the Just Leadership by bearing both burdens and heavy things.

- 25 The eyes of the people have been plunged into deep sleep since he started guarding them by night; and how pleasant is this Guardian!
- 26 The clouds of reward and punishment carry with them clouds of sustenance and preordained death.
- 27 He helped the Dynasty of the clan of Aḥmad, after it had been brought into confusion, and after its shadow had acknowledged that it would soon end.
- 28 If the emergence (ṭulūʿ) of Ṭalâʿiʿ had not taken place, and if he had not defended You by fighting and disputing with your enemies,
- 29 then there would not have been one person left in all the districts of Egypt who would have remained loyal to the sons of the Prophet.
- 30 What marvelous powers of decision he has, neither bowed down by fear of ruin, nor by the council meeting of censors!
- 31 The Victory of the Imâms does not change into a Defeat or a multitude of deserting people.
- 32 Thus he sought advice from the truthfulness of the souls, until they had brought ʿAbbâs to the most terrible of ends.
- 33 Because of the souls, the directions of his banners were narrow, while the sly-eyed people continually practised the deceit of the stealthy hunter.
- As concerns the expression of al-hûlu, the sly-eyed: this is assuredly a reference to the Crusaders.
- 34 After they had been elevated, since they both became allies of low behaviour and underwent exemplary punishment and You abandoned him and his son
- 35 His (scil., the Vizier's) clouds of Red Revenge throw themselves against the pair of them, filled with Woe and Disaster.

28

Although the Imâmate remained undamaged after the elimination of ʿAbbâs and his blood-thirsty son, the precarious health of the little child al-Fâʿiz who had now been promoted to Imâm gave cause for concern. By the time he was installed as Imâm, al-Fâʿiz had already seen a considerable number of disasters with his own eyes. In the hall where the actual installation took place he had seen the bodies of his two uncles; and not far away in the Vizieral palace, although unknown to him, his father's remains had been thrown down a shaft by the wicked pair ʿAbbâs and Naṣr.

At the installation itself, the thousand people present showed their support of him by uttering a great shout, crying: "We hear and obey!" According to historians the little Imâm collapsed when he heard them; and the fright which seized him had far-reaching consequences, for he was seen to weep and cry for the rest of his short life. He is also said to have urinated in fright when carried upon the shoulders of the traitrous Vizier ʿAbbâs, but this story may have been inspired by an example from the history of the Prophet's family: tradition has it that, as a child, Ḥasan also urinated upon the lap of (his grandfather Abu l-Qâsim) Mohammed. This coincidence would have made a great impression upon the mind of a well-brought-up believer<sup>100</sup>. The child also appears to have suffered from regular epileptic attacks.

The historian Ibn al-Ṭuwayr describes the incident as follows:

“They say that he urinated upon the shoulder of the Vizier, ‘Abbâs. The crowd saw the fluid from him flowing over the chest of ‘Abbâs. Al-Fâ’iz was so much unsettled by that shout that he encountered regular attacks of epilepsy, thus becoming confused.

“After that, Vizier ‘Abbâs gave ‘Isâ ibn al-Zâfir the honorific title ‘The Conqueror through the Support of Allah’ and appointed a guardian for him, someone who was in awe of him (‘Abbâs). And he gave him (the child) to the Zimâm al-Qaṣr and caused him to be transferred to his mother or, as some say, his grandmother.”<sup>101</sup>

The affairs of the State and the Dynasty greatly improved with the arrival of Ṭalâ’i‘ who received the honorific title al-Malik al-Ṣâliḥ (the Pious King) from the Imâm al-Fâ’iz –or rather, from the Imâm’s aunt who acted as Regent for her young nephew.

A period of stability now seemed to have dawned. However in 555 H an important change occurred: the child Imâm, who had always been in a state of precarious health, now died and his successor, al-‘Âḍid, came to the throne.

Al-‘Âḍid was to reign for a period of more than ten years and at first all appeared to be going smoothly. However the Vizier Ṭalâ’i‘ was unable to enhance the solidity of the reign of the Ruzzîk Dynasty which he himself had started. Indeed, he died, the victim of a murderous plot, shortly after the installation of al-‘Âḍid.

It should be noted that the Rabîb and his son had died some years earlier in 550 H. The Rabîb himself had died when Ṭalâ’i‘ took office: fleeing from Cairo he became involved in a fight with Frankish Crusaders on the way to Syria. His son Naṣr had been taken captive by the Franks and transferred to al-Qâhira in exchange for money, as part of a deal arranged by the Imâm’s aunt, and he had been tortured to death by this same woman.

<sup>100</sup> As to the earlier incident, we are enlightened by Henri Lammens, whom we will quote here:

“Peu après la naissance de Ḥasan, Omm al-Faḍl – on ignore comment elle se trouvait à Médine – l’avait apporté au Prophète. Placé sur ses genoux, le bébé, avec l’inconscience propre à cet âge, s’oublia. L’épouse de ‘Abbâs se précipitant lui donna des coups entre les deux épaules. “Doucement, cria le grand-père, ne va pas causer de mal à mon fils.” Dans ces circonstances, il se contentait de réparer l’incident avec quelques gouttes d’eau et redemandait ses enfants. Scène attendrissante! Jusque dans les détails les plus intimes, Abou’l Qâsim demeurerait pour la postérité “le beau modèle, uswa ḥasana”. De l’air le plus convaincu, la Tradition continue à lui prêter la pleine conscience de ce rôle et l’amène à poser comme devant un objectif. (On lui fait choisir les pratiques les plus faciles; il craint incessamment de “créer une sonna”).” See for further reference, H. Lammens, Fāṭima et les filles de Mahomet, notes critiques pour l’étude de la Sira, Rome 1912, p. 96.

Even though he had also taken flight to Syria with his co-conspirators ‘Abbâs and Naṣr, the arch-intriguer Usâma ibn al-Munqidh had remained on very friendly terms with the Vizier Ṭalâ’i’.

For instance, we find a poem composed by the new Vizier al-Malik al-Ṣâliḥ Ṭalâ’i’ quoted in Usâma’s collected works. In this poem, which is in fact a letter written in verse, Ṭalâ’i’ states that he regrets Usâma’s departure from Egypt. It seems as if Ṭalâ’i’ longs for the companionship of Usâma whom he appears to consider as an old friend who will now remain for ever out of reach in far-off Shayzar (the home town of the Usâma clan) in Northern Syria. Ṭalâ’i’'s poem is as follows:

سُرَى الْعِيسِ بَلْ رَكُضُ الْمُطَهَّمَةِ الْقُبِّ	٥ أَخْلَائِي لَوْ رُمْتُمْ دُنُوءًا لِمَا أَبَى
عَدَاةً اشْتَرَيْتُمْ وَحَشَةَ الْبُعْدِ بِالْقُرْبِ	٦ وَلَكِنِّكُمْ بَعُثْتُمْ وَفَاءً بِغَدْرَةٍ
لَأَعْظَمُ مَا قَدْ كَانَ مِنْ ذَلِكَ الْخَطْبِ	٧ عَلَيْكُمْ سَلَامُ اللَّهِ إِنَّ بَعَادَتَكُمْ
نُظَاهِرُ دُونَ النَّاسِ عَبَّاسَ بِالْحَرْبِ	٨ وَلَوْ أَنَّ كُنَّا ظَنَنَّا لَمْ نَكُنْ
نَبِيَّ الْهُدَى مَا لَمْ يَنْلَهُ بَنُو حَرْبِ	٩ عَلَى أَنَّهُ قَدْ نَالَ بِالْغَدْرِ مِنْ بَنِي
مِنَ النَّاسِ فَوْقَ الْقَتْلِ وَالسَّبْيِ وَالنَّهْبِ	١٠ وَهَلْ نَالَ مِنْهُمْ آلُ حَرْبٍ وَغَيْرُهُمْ
دِمَاءُهُمْ لَا حَاطَهُ اللَّهُ مِنْ حِزْبِ	١١ غَدَاً وَالْغَا كَالْكَلْبِ ظُلُمًا وَحِزْبُهُ
لِمَالِكِهِ بَعْضُ الَّذِي هُوَ فِي الْكَلْبِ	١٢ وَيَا لَيْتَهُ لَوْ كَانَ فِيهِ مِنَ الْوَفَا
وَلَا لَكُمْ فِيمَا جَرَى مِنْهُ مِنْ ذَنْبِ	١٣ وَحَاشَاكُمْ مَا خُنْتُمْ الْعَهْدَ مِثْلَهُ
يُحَادِرُ أَنْ تَدْنُو الصِّحَاحُ مِنَ الْجُرْبِ	١٤ وَمِنْ مِثْلِ مَا قَدْ نَالَكُمْ مِنْ دُنُوهِ

- 5 Oh my friends! If you wished to approach us, neither approaching by white camels at night, nor even travelling by caparisoned horses by day would be denied you.
- 6 But on the morning that you bought the loneliness of a remote land in exchange for closeness, you sold trust in exchange for treachery.
- 7 May the Peace of Allah be upon you! Your absence is the greatest of all possible disasters.
- 8 Had we foreseen it, we would not have supported ‘Abbâs in the heat of war at the expense of other people.

Here Ṭalâ’i’ ibn Ruzzîk is expressing his regret that during a much earlier period in his life when he was merely an Amîr muqaddam (commanding officer) during the regime of Vizier ‘Alî Ibn al-Salâr, he had as a subordinate taken the side of ‘Abbâs al-Ṣanhâjî al-Rabîb on the battlefield when the latter was serving as a general under Ibn al-Salâr. The expedition was led by ‘Abbâs and Ṭalâ’i’ against the Bedouins and Ibn Maṣâl. The latter was later to become yet another Vizier deposed by violence.

- 9 Because he had betrayed the Sons of the Prophet of Right Guidance, he acquired something which the Banû Ḥarb (the Umayyads) had never managed to acquire.
The Umayyads had wrongfully seized the Caliphate after the first four rightly guided Caliphs, thus putting an end to the line of Shī'ite Imāms upon the Caliphal throne.
- 10 Have the clan of Ḥarb and those others then acquired from them something more than murder and the taking of prisoners and plunder?
- 11 He ('Abbās) arrived in the morning with his co-conspirators with heavy-handed injustice, lapping up blood like dogs. May God not preserve such a man as he!
- 12 Oh, if only he had shown towards his owner even part of the fidelity found in the dog!
Compare Ibn al-Salār and the question which he addressed to Naṣr son of 'Abbās, 'Oh You (miserable) cur! Where are you?' Compare also the later strangling of the Imām al-Zâfir within the residence of Naṣr and his father 'Abbās.
- 13 But this should be no concern of yours, (oh clan of Usâma), for you have not betrayed the bond and have committed no sin in the matter which he instigated.
- 14 You should be on your guard, (oh clan of Usâma), against the contamination of approaching him, for 'a healthy man should beware of approaching those suffering from scabies.'<sup>102</sup>

30

The above passage from a poem originating from the pen of Vizier Ṭalâ'i' himself, gives the impression that because of his conciliatory attitude, Ṭalâ'i' did not cause much enmity against himself. However webs of intrigue between Imām and Vizier continued to be woven, and once again the conspiracies germinating within the palace bore fruit. In all probability the aunt acting as Regent was involved, for she was soon executed by Ruzzîk, the son of Ṭalâ'i', when he followed his father upon the Vizieral throne and instigated punitive measures against those who had taken part in the murder plot.

On the other hand the relationship between Ṭalâ'i' and Usâma was allowed no further chance to affect the political affairs of Egypt. The connection between arch-intriguer and Vizier continued, but now the physical distance between them prevented new intrigues from being instigated by the wily Usâma.

Only in 555 H when Usâma was informed that al-Fâ'iz had died was there at last justification for the poet, that is Usâma, to send a very simple poem offering condolences to Ṭalâ'i' in connection with the sad loss of the Imām:

١ هَنَاءٌ بِنِعْمَى قُلٍّ عَنْ قَدْرِهَا الشُّكْرُ      وَصَبْرُ الرُّزْءِ لَا يَقُومُ بِهِ الصَّبْرُ
٢ مَضَى الْفَائِزُ الطَّهْرُ الْإِمَامُ وَقَامَ بـ      الْإِمَامَةُ فِينَا بَعْدَهُ الْعَاضِدُ الطَّهْرُ

٢ إِمَامُهُدًى لِّلَّهِ فِي نَقْلِ ذَا إِلَى      كَرَامَتِهِ وَفِي إِقَامَةِ ذَا سِرٍّ
 ؛ فَعِشْ أَبَدًا وَسَلِّمْ يَا كَفِيلَهُمْ      تُدَافِعُ عَنْهُمْ كُلَّ حَادِثَةٍ تَعْرُو

- 1 Congratulations on a benefaction for which every form of gratitude is small, and upon enduring a disaster which cannot bear perseverance.
- 2 The Pure al-Fâ'iz, the Imâm, has departed; and following his death the Pure al-Âḍid has taken the Imamate upon himself in our midst.
- 3 Allah has a secret: Two Imâms of Just Leadership. He transfers one to His generosity and He allows the other to survive.
- 4 Oh Regent of them both, live forever and remain safe! Then You will be able to stave off every impending disaster.<sup>103</sup>

Like his immediate predecessor, the newly-installed Imâm al-Âḍid was very young and inexperienced. As his Regent, Ṭalâ'i' apparently entertained the idea of overruling him. But Ṭalâ'i' had not taken into account the opposition coming from the new Imâm's aunts whose own brothers had been murdered.

Viziers often died prematurely, either as a result of violence exerted by rival competitors for the Vizierate or as a result of discontent prevailing in the circles around the palace.

In 556 H, death came to al-Malik al-Şâliḥ, Fâris al-Muslimîn, Nâṣir al-Dîn, Abû l-Ghârât Ṭalâ'i' b Ruzzîk when he was no longer considered capable of fulfilling the position indicated by his honorific titles. Thus this Pious King, this Mounted Knight of the Muslims and Supporter of Religion who in previous times had defended the Imâms as a Father of Military Expeditions, was now and for all time lost to the Dynasty of the Imâms.

And finally, of course, there is something else for us to consider: what was 'Umâra's own opinion of the murders in Cairo? What did he himself say about all these killings? What can we deduce from his surviving words?

Obviously we should remember that 'Umâra had first encountered the Vizier Ṭalâ'i' when he arrived in Egypt as an ambassador from Yemen. Not long before their meeting, Ṭalâ'i' had been prepared to offer his support to the aunts of al-Fâ'iz when these ladies were seeking revenge upon 'Abbâs and his son Naṣr. The aunts—who were the sisters of the murdered Imâm al-Zâfir—were thus clearly able to re-instate the Imâmâte more or less as they pleased.

We should also remember that Ṭalâ'i' had been able to chase away 'Abbâs and his son, both of them criminals; and in fact this had served as a kind of official termination of employment.

<sup>103</sup> Al-Maqrîzî, Itti'âz III, 243; see Anlsl 35 (2001), p. 569-570, where the poem is also quoted.

It was not the vengeance of the Imâm which had led to this dismissal, but rather the anger of only one man, Governor Ṭalâ'i', who had himself come from a remote region in the south of Egypt.

After this, Ṭalâ'i' became Vizier instead of 'Abbâs.

It may have been this ability of Ṭalâ'i' and his clan, to give quick and successful help which made an impression on the mind of the poet 'Umâra, for we hear the poet comparing this action of the leader of the Ruzzîk family to the movement of a chess piece, the so-called Rukh—which is known as the “rook” or “castle” in English.

According to the poet, this Rook had come from a remote region in order to offer his strength to the tottering Fatimid Dynasty:

“His noble racehorses came to you at the farthest bounds of the frontiers, just like the rukḥ (Rook) which comes to you along the edges of the chessboard.”

In this poem to rhyme naskhu the poet addresses a gathering of Fatimid Shi'ite friends as follows<sup>104</sup>:

- قال في رجب وقد اقترح عليه ذلك هو وغيره
- |    |                                |                                |
|----|--------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| ١  | أحبابنا كم تبخلون وكم تسخو     | ببذل وداد لا يغيره نسخ         |
| ٢  | وهل منكر فعل القطيعة منكم      | وما داركم إلا القطيعة والكرخ   |

<sup>104</sup> 'Umâra's poem to rhyme naskhu, dedicated to an unknown personage, but possibly addressed to Ruzzîk ibn Ṭalâ'i'. The poem is found in Ms. D folio 37 recto - 38 recto, but it is lacking in Ms. Rabat; in the edition Derenbourg Nukat Diwan, p. 195-196, there are only lines 1-7, 19-25, 31-32. In total, this poem consists of 32 lines.

فَيُرْجَى لَهَا نَفْحٌ وَيُخْشَى لَهَا نَفْحُ

“He said in the month Rajab the following lines, when this theme was offered to himself and other poets:”

- 1 Oh friends of ours! How frequently will you be miserly in the granting of love which can never be rescinded (naskh)?

This is a play on words in relation to the abrogation of a Koranic verse, which procedure is also called naskh. In the following line is a pun: the Baghdad neighbourhoods al-Qatī'a and al-Karkh are traditionally known for their opposition against the Sunnitic Caliphate, because their inhabitants were mainly adhering to the Shi'a persuasion:

- 2 Shall you then be blamed for the act of breaking off the relationship (fi'l al-qaṭī'a) whilst your dwelling place is none other than the vicinity of al-Qatī'a and al-Karkh?

- 3 My action concerning this love you have scolded for being an act of weakness whereby I have loosened the cord of faithfulness; but as for you, don't release it.
- 4 In this love you have nullified my actions by acting contrarily; for I have made a contract with love but you have arranged for its cancellation (naskhu).
- 5 You were rough, whilst my feelings of love for you were finely polished; similarly there is never a day when the thorny qatâd plant resembles the stem of the soft woody markh.
- 6 You have been unjust towards a Dawla 'Âdiliyya; both Praise and Power had composed well-embellished words about its days.
- 7 Its standing has surpassed the level of the constellation of Simâk, but in the heart of its owner there are no stirrings of haughtiness.
- 8 The Treasure Chest of the Imâms decked her (i.e. the renewed Dynasty) with brilliance; on account of her youth, the grey of the nights bloomed afresh.
- 9 Look! For you will find every kind of excellence upon his throne whenever the highest of ranks reveal themselves upon the Face-of-the-Throne through a smile.
- 10 Encircled by his crown (turban) there is a Full Moon (i.e. his face), and in his hand there is healing rain; upon his saddle is a Lion and upon his throne is Power.
- 11 You have short-haired horses like ravening lions; Victory always appears upon their banners and Paws, still supple with their claws retracted.
- 12 His noble racehorses came to you at the farthest bounds of the frontiers, just like the rukḥ (Rook) which comes to you along the edges of the chessboard.
- 13 You see a bird from the constellation of Twin Eagles, the first to swoop down upon the enemy, whom you will find in every abyss hissing with snakes.
- 14 The winds of Victory drove their cloud of severity forward; and afterwards people hoped for an exhalation of perfume and the strong blast of the bugle.
- 15 Whenever they alight upon the crown of the head of a proud tyrant in all his guile, then a sword striking the crown of his head will feel like a heavy weight.
- 16 How many necks desired shiqâq [i.e. both severing and rebellion]; how many a beautiful object was destroyed by the caress of a sword, being deformed into the exact opposite of what was desired.
- 17 On the Day that Ṭalâ'i' became a martyr—by God!—how good your persistence and courage were, even though the terrain offered little room to manoeuvre.
- 18 Where many clear-sighted people were undecided, You stood Your ground; You and Your people were Cords whose very nature was steadfast.
- 19 When You saw that the pillars of the Kingdom were beginning to fall, and that its handholds were weakened and almost bent,
- 20 You divided both benefactions and disasters among mortal men: there was a smash on the head for a rebel, and a gift for the one who swore the (inaugural) oath.
- 21 Thus You have established a 'Âḍidic installation (bay'a) amongst us; and that is a binding Contract.
- 22 Oh Banu Ruzzîk, you possess an excellence which shall be made eternal; the copying of it on the Sheets of Your Fame in this fashion will perpetuate that fame.

- 23 Blessed may he be (here 'Umâra is again obliquely referring to himself) who establishes your deeds in his poetry to bear fruit, so that by these deeds a Branch grows forth and a Root grows deeper.
- 24 Their insight was patient, like steep mountains; their noses were high, yet they were not interested in flaunting themselves.
- 25 Fuṣṭât (Old Cairo) has now become my residence because of you; but neither Samarqand nor Balkh will ever be a resting place for my riding-camel.
- 26 Saved from amongst the racehorses of the Elevation, the silent one (al-ṣâmit) stands before you; but only misfortune and defilement await the one who reaches out towards your aspirations.
- 27 Let kings stand ransom for you, with no one holding back (bilâ shawîya); when praising them, the countenances of these verses have swelled with pride.
- On the use of shawîya in the wording of line 27, "Let kings stand ransom for you, with no one holding back (bilâ shawîya)", a comment is found in the dictionary Lisân al-'Arab, where we read as follows: "and al-shawîya signifies the remains of some undefined people who have perished. This forms in plural: shawâyâ. And it is alleged that those people "are the remains of the worst among the wicked tribe of Thamûd."<sup>105</sup>
- 28 Where they have sprinkled (nadaḥû), you have watered in abundance (naḍakhta); and this one sort of sprinkling (al-naḍḥu) does not resemble the other outpouring (al-naḍkhu).
- 29 Though they are content with the rind and the bone of the Elevation, yet you have its secrets: sap and marrow are at your disposal.
- 30 These are the results through which a beam has been inserted into the eye of the enemy; and in his ears they have caused a blockage;
- 31 and they have caused livers to melt from rage and sorrow in a fire, through which there is a seething without end in the heart of anyone jealous of him.
- 32 May the World enjoy your Dawla; whenever it is mentioned in my poetry, people will say of it, 'Bravo!'.

Clearly the Vizier Ṭalâ'i' has made a great impression on our poet. 'Umâra sees the Vizier as a saviour in line 12 when he compares him to a powerful piece in the game of chess, a Rook who swoops in from the sidelines and saves the game.

The poet remarks that by his action, the "Dawla 'Âdiliyya" has been saved. Here it seems that the Dawla intended is the Dynasty originally founded by Talai'i'.

As the poet uses the expression "Dawla 'Âdiliyya" we can conclude that this poem was written afterwards, in hindsight, to describe the time when Ruzzîk, the son of Ṭalâ'i' with the honorific title al-'Âdil, was on the throne. The poet speaks of the courageous conduct of this son who tried to defend his father at the moment when the latter, as Vizier, was being attacked by murderous villains just as all those other Viziers had been attacked.

Despite the son and his bravery, the father Ṭalâ'i' became a martyr (shahîd), as the poet acknowledges in line 17:

ولله في يوم الشهيد طائع      ثباتك والإقدام موطئها رنج

On the Day that Ṭalâ'i' became a martyr—by God!—how good your persistence and courage were even though the terrain offered little room to manoeuvre.

Although the poet is addressing the son Ruzzîk ibn Ṭalâ'i', he is obviously still grateful for the manner in which he was welcomed in Egypt, long ago, when Ruzzîk's father was alive. This Ruzzîk clan which saved the Imâmitic Dawla was also the reason why the poet had preferred to live for all time in al-Fusṭât, i.e. in Old Cairo, in Egypt.

Clearly 'Umâra preferred Egypt to living in a remote town such as Samarqand or a far-flung region such as Balkh. It is interesting however to note that some hundred years earlier another poet (Nâṣiri Khosraw) had completed the long journey between Balkh and Old Cairo in the reverse direction, travelling by stages from the Egypt of an earlier Imâm to his home in Balkh.
