In his engaging and insightful reappraisal of Jāmī's allegorical romance Salāmān va Absāl, Chad Lingwood offers a contextualised interpretation and translation of this enigmatic tale, which on its surface concerns the amorous relationship between a young prince and his wet-nurse. Previous studies have concentrated on the mystical dimension of the romance. Lingwood's study, however, portrays Salāmān va Absāl as a mirror for princes, imbued with a symbolism that operates on three distinct yet interrelated levels of meaning: an ethical-political level, a mystical level and a historical level. Notwithstanding Jāmī's residence in Timurid Herat, Lingwood relates the themes and protagonists of Salāmān va Absāl to particular individuals and events at the Aqqyunlu court of Ya'qūb b. Ūzūn Ḥasan in Tabriz, the Aqqyunlu capital since 873/1468. This approach yields, among other insights, a revised dating for the text's composition: whereas earlier studies have taken Salāmān va Absāl to represent Jāmī's gift to Ya'qūb, to whom it is dedicated, on the occasion of the ruler's coronation in 885/1480, Lingwood argues persuasively for its composition between 893/1488, the year of Ya'qūb's repentance of his addiction to wine and his public commitment to abstinence, and 895/1490, the year of the ruler's death.

The book consists of an introduction, five chapters, a conclusion and two appendices. The first chapter presents Lingwood's leading primary sources. Lingwood provides a synopsis of Salāmān va Absāl, discusses the story's provenance, and traces the appearances of its two major protagonists, Salāmān and Absāl, in earlier literature, notably in the writings of Ibn Sīnā and Ibn Ṭufayl. The second part of the chapter addresses the principal literary materials that provide the context for Lingwood's analysis of Salāmān va Absāl. He introduces, on the one hand, the Persian genre of the mirror for princes, with particular reference to examples that reflect a Sufi orientation; and on the other hand, the historiographical sources relevant to the reign of Ya'qūb. It is chiefly within the frameworks of these two bodies of literature that Lingwood interprets Jāmī's romance in his subsequent chapters.

The second chapter identifies a number of ideas characteristic of Persian mirrors for princes and situates Salāmān va Absāl within this literary genre. Particularly relevant in this regard are the Aḥlāq-i Jalālī of Jalāl al-Dīn Davānī, composed in an Aqqyunlu context, and the writings of Ḥusayn Vā'iz Kāshifī, especially his Aḥlāq-i Muḥsinī, dedicated to the Timurid Sulṭān-Ḥusayn Bāyqarā and his son Abū l-Muḥsin Mīrzā on the occasion of the latter's repentance from the drinking of wine in Herat. By reference to these writings, Lingwood evokes a literary-cultural context for Jāmī's composition, in which he demonstrates the intersection of the Persian mirror literature and the mystical language characteristic of Sufi writings; for example, he identifies the allegorical appearance in Salāmān va Absāl of essential components of the mystical path, such as repentance (tawba) and the subjugation of the carnal soul (nafs).

The third chapter addresses the religious and political influences of Sufis at the Aqqyunlu courts of Ūzūn Ḥasan and Ya'qūb, with particular attention to Khalvati and Naqshbandi figures. With reference to literary and historical materials, Lingwood likens the relationship between Jāmī and Ya'qūb to that of pīr and murīd. As Ya'qūb's father Ūzūn Ḥasan had supported mystics of various allegiances in his cultivation of the image of a worthy ruler, Ya'qūb too projected his associations with dervishes in laying claim to political legitimacy. Lingwood finds that while the Khalvati order retained its established prominence during the reign of Ya'qūb, individual members of the Naqshbandi order, pre-eminent in the Timurid domains by the second half of the fifteenth century, also possessed considerable authority at the Aqqyunlu court. A number of Naqshbandi teachers resided in Tabriz for certain periods, and the Naqshbandi 'Abd al-Vahhāb held the office of Ya'qūb's ṣayḥ al-Islām. When in 891/1486 Ya'qūb, in a moment of drunken anger, instigated the killing of Darvīš Qāsim, a prominent Naqshbandi, he substantially alienated the people of Tabriz, a rupture resolved only with Ya'qūb's public repentance from wine and his prohibition of its consumption among the city's residents. This episode provided the setting for Ya'qūb's correspondence with Jāmī, who, in offering Ya'qūb advice, refrained from addressing the Aqqyunlu ruler with the conventional string of praiseworthy epithets that he had employed in his correspondence with his father Ūzūn Ḥasan.

The fourth chapter relates Salāmān va Absāl to the Persianate literary milieu of fifteenth-century Tabriz, and links it with the poetry of Ahlī Šīrāzī, Bābā Fiḡānī and other poets who enjoyed the patronage of Ya'qūb and his vizier Qāzī 'Isā Sāvajī. Lingwood's point of departure in this chapter is the supposition that Ya'qūb's murder of Darvīš Qāsim demonstrated his need for self-restraint, and that when Jāmī's Salāmān va Absāl arrived at the Aqqyunlu court, it is likely to have been perceived as a mirror for princes designed for Ya'qūb's edification. Lingwood traces correspondences between the major protagonists in Salāmān va Absāl and historical individuals at Ya'qūb's court: Salāmān represents Ya'qūb, wine is personified in Absāl, the king of Greece represents the ideal of kingship, the sage represents Qāzī 'Īsā Sāvajī. He further proposes that members of the Aqqyunlu royal household would have interpreted Jāmī's depiction of the forbidden relationship between Salāmān and his wet-nurse, Absāl, as an allusion to the politically unacceptable relationship between Qāzī 'Īsā and Ya'qūb's sister. With reference to several other poetic works written for Ya'qūb, Lingwood suggests the particular meanings likely to have adhered to terms and phrases in Jāmī's allegory in the context of the Aqqyunlu court at this time.

The fifth chapter offers a theosophical interpretation of Salāmān va Absāl. In Lingwood's interpretation, Salāmān embodies the union of the opposed forces of reason and love: he undergoes a transformation from carnal to spiritual, a process that culminates in his inheritance, after Absāl's death, of his father's throne. Throughout his book, Lingwood alerts his readers to Jāmī's echoing of Rūmī's Maṣnavī, the metre of which the later poet adopted in Salāmān va Absāl. In this chapter, Lingwood explores this inter-textuality in greater detail; he traces Jāmī's numerous allusions to Rūmī's poetry, and explores the correspondences between the Maṣnavī's opening tale and Salāmān va Absāl. He also discerns allusions in Salāmān va Absāl to Ibn al-'Arabī's explication of three kinds of love. From this discussion Salāmān va Absāl appears as an 'allegory of ideas', in which Jāmī alludes to distinctive Naqshbandi doctrines and techniques, such as silent zīkr, the practice of fixing the image of the shaykh in the heart, and the shaykh's ability to concentrate and deploy his spiritual energy (himmat). At the same time, Salāmān va Absāl is, as Lingwood argues further, a 'historical allegory', in which the characters and their actions represent specific historical figures and events.

The first appendix that follows Lingwood's multi-faceted study is a translation of Jāmī's epistolary reply to Ya'qūb. The second appendix consists of a translation of Salāmān va Absāl, which runs to 1,130 couplets. Lingwood's translation possesses the virtues of clarity, consistency and accessibility, and conveys the instructive tone of Jāmī's narratives. Readily comprehensible to the reader who lacks access to the Persian text, the translation remains recognisable to the reader who knows Persian and wishes to gain an impression of the original.

In places, the book possesses a slightly diffuse quality that is perhaps inevitable in a study of a text that integrates several levels of meaning and employs simultaneously a plurality of symbolic systems. It is challenging to divide, for purposes of explication and analysis, materials that are presented as a complex interrelated organic unity. The repetition of certain points and the treatment of parts of a theme across several different chapters make it somewhat more difficult for the reader to grasp their full significance at any given point. Readers will benefit, however, from the excellent and detailed index, which greatly enhances the book's usefulness to a broad audience.

In short, Lingwood's study of Salāmān va Absāl represents a valuable and significant contribution to many areas of scholarly interest. In Politics, Poetry, and Sufism he develops the approach of Maria Eva Subtelny, whose studies of Kāshifī's Ahlāq-i Muḥsinī have similarly demonstrated a complex interplay of ethical-political, mystical and historical meanings. Indeed, Lingwood adds to the growing number of studies that demonstrate the specificity of mirrors for princes, notwithstanding the camouflage within which they often appear. By reference to contemporary and near-contemporary writings in various genres, he shows by the example of Salāmān va Absāl the precise meanings that mirrors carried for their audiences, regardless of the timeless and universal appearance of many of the materials deployed in their presentation. By means of a thorough, careful and thoughtful study of an important work of Persian poetry, Lingwood sheds light on numerous aspects of the milieu for which it was written.
