A Headless Block Statuette of the XXVIth Dynasty (CGC 94I)

NOHA SHALABY

THIS ARTICLE deals with the inscribed block statuette CGC 94I kept in the basement of the Egyptian Museum in Cairo.¹ No precise provenance is mentioned in the registers (SR 573), however the statuette belongs to a priest called Pastjenef who presumably lived in Thebes as could be inferred from the citation of “Amun of Karnak” in his title ḥm-ntr Ḳmn m Ḳpt-swt. He is most probably the same priest of Amun mentioned in Brooklyn Papyrus 47.2I8.3 who lived during the early part of the XXVIth dynasty. The statuette displays a rare XXVIth dynasty occurrence of the title ḥry-sšꜣ n mnḥt špst nt ḥꜣw-ntr, which had been already attested in few examples from the XXIIInd dynasty. In accordance with the hieroglyphic text, which is transcribed by Borchartd in his Catalogue Général (CGC 94I),² some brief references to this statuette are found in egyptological literature.³

General Description

[FIG. I-III]

The statuette is made of grey granite. It measures 30 cm in height, 18 cm in width, and 17 cm in depth. It depicts a man sitting with his arms crossed over the knees, which are drawn up to shoulder level. The statuette is not in a good state of preservation; head and feet are missing,

Unlike the usual type of block statues, in which the subject is entirely wrapped in a cloak as a formless mass, the statuette CGC 941 reflects a natural appearance of the body. It shows the figure with the upper part of the body exposed wearing a long, tight and smooth skirt, which, in profile, transparently reveals the shape of the legs and nearly reaches to the ankles. The limbs are free from the cubic structure with bare arms freely modeled three-quarters in the round and feet were left uncovered. Bothmer commented on this type of block statues since the appearance of its prototype in the Middle Kingdom⁴ until the beginning of the 1st century BC. He quoted that it was frequent in the XXVth and early XXVIth dynasties, and added that it was abandoned by the end of Psamtik I's reign to be revived in the IVth century BC.⁵ However, Perdu noted recently that examples of this type were attested in the XXVIth dynasty after Psamtik I until the reign of Apries.⁶

Pastjenes was most probably wearing a simple shoulder-length plain wide bag wig, the bottom of which is apparent above the rectangular back pillar. A close view to the top of the latter shows that it extends very slightly beyond the wig surface level, a feature assigned to sculptures of the XXVth and the beginning of XXVIth dynasties.⁷

The right arm crosses over the left. The left hand lies open with palm down while the clenched right one holds a folded kerchief. Block statues holding kerchief are well known since the New Kingdom till the beginning of the XXVIth dynasty as it was noted recently by Perdu.⁸ But, as Bothmer had stated, the type of CGC 941—torso, arms and feet bare while legs transparently covered—grasping the kerchief are only attested under Psamtik I.⁹ In fact, the examples gathered by Perdu¹⁰ attributed to the XXVth dynasty showed only one exact parallel of the type under discussion: the statuette JE 36993 dated by Bothmer to the XXVth dynasty,¹¹ and in a more recent study to the XXVIth dynasty (reign of Psamtik I).¹²

The short garment is secured at the waist by a band or belt surmounted by a motif. The latter consists of very small vertical adjacent loop shapes. This pattern, found on a number of seated and standing figures, either above the waistband of a skirt or upon the chest area forming the edges of a mantle wrapped around the body, is unusual for a garment on a block statue. It made its debut in the Middle Kingdom and continued to be employed in the costumes on sculptures from the New Kingdom, the Third Intermediate Period down to the XXVIth dynasty.¹³ In fact, the figure would appear to be a nude sculpture if it were not for the belt with the clear motif visible from the sides and the back, and the bottom edge of the skirt that is evident in the right side. Finally, Pastjenef is seated on a very low round cushion, which was particularly recurrent at the end of the XXVth and the beginning of the XXVIth dynasty.¹⁴

Texts

The front of the skirt bears five neatly framed lines of hieroglyphic inscriptions, of which the beginning of last three are partly damaged. The back pillar is carved with two columns of inscriptions.

Comments

- The Saite Formula ntr-nṯwty (n) NN dṯ.tw ḥꜣ(.f) ḥft kꜣ.f m-bꜣḥ.f Ḳwny-pw, encountered almost exclusively on the back pillar of various types of statues, is a short text including a common appeal of the owner of the statuette to the local deity; on this formula, see K. Jansen-Winkel, SAK 28, 2000, p. 83-124.
- The imy-st-(nt-)^c, translated as “acolyte, helper, or ritual assistant”, is an official within the persons in charge of the routine temple administration integrated into the phyle system—with no grading or ranking, see J.K. Thomson, “A First Acolyte of Amun”, JEA 84, 1998, p. 215-220. For this title, see R.A. Parker, A Saite Oracle Papyrus, p. 30; J. Quaegebeur, “Documents Concerning a Cult of Arsinoe Philadelphos at Memphis”, JNES 30, 1971, p. 268-270.
- On the title imy-st-(nt-)^c n pꜣ ḥtp ꜣ w' b n pr Ḳmn, which started to be held by the priests of Thebes in the Third Intermediate Period and continued to be used up to the Ptolemaic Period, see J. Quaegebeur, “La table d’offrandes grande et pure d’Amon”, RdE 45, 1994, p. 155-173.

General Commentary

The statuette owner Pastjenef, son of Horsiese, served as a priest of Amun in the 3rd phyle at Karnak where he was in charge of the costumes used to envelop the statue of Amun-Re during the daily rituals. He was also responsible for the great and pure offering table.

The statuette CGC 941 had been merely dated through the texts by Jansen-Winkel to the XXVth dynasty.¹⁵ However, Bothmer’s general iconographical remark as regards the kerchief (supra) had presented a more precise dating criterion. Accordingly, the statuette is most probably dated to the reign of Psamtik I, which corresponds with the date of the procession stated in the Brooklyn Papyrus 47.218.3.

¹⁵ K. JANSEN-WINKEL, SAK 28, 2000, p. III (59).

Though at a casual glance this fragmentary example would seem very common among the sculptures of the Late Period, it is a significant piece of Saite art since it displays three points of particular interest. The first is the title (ḥry-ššꜣ (n) mnḥt špst nt ḥ'w-nṯr) inscribed twice on the statuette for being rarely encountered in general, and being unusual on the sculptures of the XXVIth dynasty in particular. The second is (ḏsr-šꜣ), which undoubtedly refers to the small temple of Medinet Habu. This gives a possibility that the owner of this statuette could be among the personnel taking part in the Decade Festival, to which there was a rare reference from the XXVIth dynasty.¹⁶ The third is the motif above the waistband employed in costumes on sculptures since the Middle Kingdom. However, it is a rare instance, on which this motif was shown on a block statue.
